THE PREFACE.

How unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my selfe, to undertake a worke of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it bene begotten then with my first dawning of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my younger yeares: and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time, I might yet well have doubted that the darknesse of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Me; long before the performance. For beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, within this our renowned Island of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better forced, with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other traualles; to haue (as together (as I could) the unemployeed and scattered fringes of our English shaires, some of the Winter fall: in whom, had there bin no other defect (who am all defect) when the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a carelesse life, drawne on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost, and soule-percing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured: with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I have tryed by the fire of Adversitie; the former enforcing, the latter perswading, have caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the subject of every opinion wise or weak.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue others that were, (Fortune changing) shed much better in any age. For, Prosperity and Adversity haue ever more tryed and varied vulgar Affections. And as we see it in experience, That dogs doe alwayes bark at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude; who, wanting that veritie which we call Honesty in all men and that especiall gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian men; condemne without hearing, and wound without offence given; lead there vnto by vncertaine report only; which his Maiesty truly acknowledge for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou haue enquired the matter; vnderstand first, and then reforme righteously. Rumor yes fine teste, fine iudice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witnesse, without iudge, malicious and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gaue Saint Augustine Argument to affirme, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the euill. And herein no man hath giuen a better rule, then this of Seneca, Conscientia satisfaciamus: nihil in hominem laboremus, sequatur vel mala, dum bene mereris. Let vs satisfie our owne consciences; and not trouble our felues with fame: bee it neuer so ill, it is to be despised for we deserue well.

For my selfe, if I haue in any thing serued my Country, and prised it before my priuate the general acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than doth a faire sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack; & the contrary no other harme than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I knowe that I lost the loue of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honor in the dust; though further then the defence of her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what deuice they did it, He that is the Supream Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath bene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind; but content myselfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other (a selfe-faction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can trauell the World without a pass port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying & extensive vertue of dead Barbs, & of that breath-giving life which God hath cast vpon time & dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read & heare, and among those that are, whom we see & conuerse with; every one hath receiued as our all picture of face, & every one a diuers picture of minde; every one a forme apart, every one a fancy & cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found so great diversity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall & vnaturall; wise, foolishly; manly, & childishly affections, and passions in mortall Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased God, to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward workes of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) giue vs where to gresse at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, very neare the life: did not craft in many feare in the most, and the worlds loue in all, reach every capacity, according to the compasse it hath, to qualifie and make ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behauiour: the things that are forced for pretences hauing no ground of truth; cannot long dissemble their owne natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may be sometimes scene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our be Multitude; Omnis honestæ rei malus iudex est vulgus: The people are euill Iudges of honest things, and whose Wisdome (leastest) is to be despised; if to the better sort; every vnderstanding hath hath a peculiar iudgement, by which is both censured other men, & valued it selfe. And therefore vnto me it will not seeme strange; though I finde these my worthles papers torne with Rats; seeing the stothfull Censurers of all ages haue not spared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the seuerest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine-glory. But of these natures which lie in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, seeing Salomon complained long since; & that the very age of the world renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leaue the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

*Ecclesiast.
Nihil facilius,

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approved custome of those, who haue left the memories of time past to after ages; to giue, as neare as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath bin honoured, in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge. That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world is selfe had life & beginning, euen to this day: yea it hath triumphed ouer time; which besides it nothing but eternitie hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast and deuouring space of many thousands of yeares; & giuen so faire & piercing eyes to our minde; that we plainly behold lining now (as if we had liued then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise worke (saith Hermas) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it (I say) it is that we liue in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was gouerned; how it was covered with waters; and againe re-peopled. How Kingdomes and Kingdomes haue flourished & fallen; and for what crime and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one & the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and out of the depth and darkenesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens for-past miseries with our owne like errors & ill desertings. But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of obscure torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupid minds; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of God doth pierce through all our practises; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of God doth require none other accusor, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalitie, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did the Heathen wisdome confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the euermourning gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaied with miseries; would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottome. The markes, set on priuate men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seen the fall of others,

doe not feare their owne faults. GOD S iudgements vpon the greater & greatest haue bene left to posteritie, first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to paym farre off, and to speake of the conuersion of Angells into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue gnawne the grasse of the earth with beasts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharao, when he slue the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in covering the Murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the Law with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse prooffe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practise, perill, bloudshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make them-selues and their issues masters of the world? And yet hath Babiló, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, &c. therof, no fruit, flower, grasse, nor leafe, springing vpon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots & ruines do hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum cœuertuntur, vel stando & durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is either ouerturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes: All Kingdomes & States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward & forraign force, or by inward negligence & dissension, or by a third cause arising from both: Others obserue, That the greatest haue sunck downe vnder their own weight; of which Liuie hath a touch: ea creuit, vt magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the diuine prouidence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of euery Estate; before their first foundation and erection. But herof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to resolue.

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, haue undertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take farre off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath bene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the success of infidelitie, iniustice, and crueltie; haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same patterne.

True it is, that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred vp a-like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne priuacie: Or otherwise best sueth with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer vchangeable; neither is hee wearied by the long process of time, and won to giue his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it bee not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discerne the bitter fruites of irreligious policie, as well among those examples that are found in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of later times. And that it may no lesse appeare by euident prooffe, than by assertion, That ill doing hath alwaies bene attended with ill success, I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed ouer the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Iustice, vpon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossessed, ouer-reach, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with about a hundred and fifty others that attended them, whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edward the Second, it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of this horrible fact no more then suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Vnckle the Earle of Kent to die for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be treason in his Vnckle, which was indeed treason in himselfe, (had his Vnckles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it other wise; though he caused Mortimer to dye for the same.

This cruelty the secret and vnsearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fell out, euen to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had bene tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsaillours, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet hee alwayes tooke himselfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples. The Baries of Huntingdon and Kent, Montague & Spencer, who thought in them-selues as great Politicians in those daies as others haue done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure them-selues, by the Murder of Gloucester; died some after with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disauowing himselfe by breach of Faith, Chartres, Pardons and Paiments:) Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousen Germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster; afterwards Henry the fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, & his obtaining the Crowne traitorous: who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend onely the recovery of his proper inheritance; brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake Faith with all the Kingdoms in Parliament; to whom hee swore that the deposed King should liue. After that hee had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had bene set vpon on all sides by his Subjects, and neuer free from conspiracies & rebellions: he saw (if soules immortal see & discern any things after the bodies death) his Grand-child Henry the sixth, & his Son the Prince, suddenly & without mercy, murdered: the possession of the Crowne (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out transferred from his race; & by the Issues of his enemies worne & enioyed: enemies, whom by his own practise he supposed that he had left no lesse power-lesse, than the succession of the Kingdom questionlesse, by entailing the same vpon his own Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no other wise, but that these cautious prouisions of the father, seconded by the valour & signall victories of his son Henry the first, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the dispaire of all reconquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Caesars also true; Dies, hora, momentum, euertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamâinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ: A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue beene founded & rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the first, vpon whom the great storme of his Grandfathers grievous fautes fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-child of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet as he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might haue defended his inheritance in France) & married the Daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that hee had in France) so in condescending to the unworthy death of his Vncle of Gloucester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster; He drew on himselfe & this kingdom the greatest inmy-loffe & dishonor shæ euer it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit vne foire gettelle Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vne foire mauuois temps. That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reigne happened in a very vnfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham & Suffolke were the practisers and contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolke, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had bin absolute; the Queene in respect of her personall wound, in pretatque iniuria forma, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seeds; shee successe to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew vp so fast as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments & armes; in which quarrel, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissuaded. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament it pleased God to strike down Yorke; yet his son the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoyled Henry the Father, and Edward, the son, both of their liues and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other then this, That shee liued to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she liued to looke on, while her Husband the King & her onely son the Prince, were hewen in sunder; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it. Shee liued to see her selfe despoyled of her Estates, and of her mouables: and lastly, her father, by rendering up to the Crowne of France the Barldome of Prouence and other places for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to became a starke Begger. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides callleth fine but vnrighteous for other fruit hath, it neuer yeelded since the world was.

And now it came to Edward the fourths turne (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted vpon one only Earle of Richmond excepted: whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation as could any way promise it selfe stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragicall Actors, there was not one, that escaped the iudgement of GOD in the same kinde. And He, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence then he him-self had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his Predecessour, taught him also by the same Art to kill his owne sons & successors Edward and Richard. For those Kings which haue sold the blood of others at a low rate; haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Maister in mischief of all that fore-went him: who although for the necessity of his Tragedie, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, then all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that played with him, as if each of them had bin acted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly vpon the affections of Hastings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as he easily allowed them to condescend, that Rulers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Vncle and his brother, should (for the first) be seuered from him: secondly, he wrought their consent to haue them imprisoned and lastly (for the avoiding of shame inconuenience) to haue their heads seuered from their bodies. And hauing now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common precept, which the Devil hath written on euery post, namely, To depreesse those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had depreest; Hee urged this argument so farre and so forcibly, as nothing but the death of the young king himselfe, & of his brother, could saluation the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoever the King or his brother, should haue able yeares to exercise their power, they would take a most seuer reuenge of that curlesse wrong, offered to their Vncle and Brother, Rulers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect: and yet the Diuell, who neuer dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when hee found by Catesby who founded him, that he was not so durable, He first resolved to kill him sitting in counsell: wherein hauing failed with his sword; He set the Hangman vpon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could moue his appetite, He caused his head to be stricken off, before hee ate his dinner. A greater iudgement of God, than this vpon Hastings I haue neuer obserued in any storie. For the selfe same day that the Earle, Rulers, Grey, and others, were without trial of Law, or offence giuen) by Hastings aduice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings him selfe in the same day, & (as I take it) in the same house, in the same low lesse manner, had his head stricken off in the Tower of London.

The Preface.

But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration persuaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And having received the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivred up by his trustiest servants. He had his head cvered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what successe had Richard himselfe after all these mischiefs & murders policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion? after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords; other than the prosperitie of so short a life as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke over and discern it? The great outcry of innocent blood, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonor, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the 7. cut off; & was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods iustice. A politicke Prince he was if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beate downe & overturned as many strong oppositions both before & after he wore the crowne as ever King of England did. I say by his wisdom, because as he ever left the reins of his affectiō in the hands of his profit, so he alwaies wayed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had wel observed the proceedings of Loys the eleventh, whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like, but he was farr more iust, and began not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, & therein exceeding wise for whatsoever him selfe gave, he him selfe received backe the thanks & the love, knowing it well that the affections of men purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits were waynes that better became great kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he greeted his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How so ever, the taking off of Stanleys head, who set the Crowne on his; & the death of the young Earle of Warwick, son to George D. of Clarence, (besides the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancesters for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eighth; if all the pitties and Paternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many servants did he aduance in hast (but for what vertue no man could suspect), and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he abundant flowers, from whence to gather bony, and in the end of Haruest burnt them in the Fire? How many viues did he cut off, & cast off as his fancy & affection chaged? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly cawle towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the account) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to haue given his account to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; & executed the Earle of Surrey the son; the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, having neuer omitted any thing that concerned his own ho-now & the Kings service; the other, neuer having omitted any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised; the other no lesse valiant than learned, & of excellent hope. But besides the sorrows which he heaped upon the Fatherlesse, & widdowes at home: and besides the vaine enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more Treasures than all our victorious Kings did in their severall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell warres did he make upon his owne Nephew King James the fifth? What Lawes & Wills did he devise to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same roote that himselfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased God to take away all his owne, without increase; though, for themselves in their severall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue bene verified upon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood, which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath dissiped by the sunshine of his grace: from whence His Maiestie now flung, & long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eie: yet could it not discern in his life, even to this day, any one of those foule spots, by which the consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bene defiled, nor any droppe of that innocent blood, which the sword of his iustice, with which the most that fore-won him, haue stayned both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England, it may truly be avowed: That he hath received it even from the hand of God, and hath stayed the time of putting it on; howsoever he were provoked to hasten in it: That he neuer tooke revenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princesse did. That his Maiestie entered not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open; and into which, by a generall love and Obedience, Hee was received. And howsoever His Maiesties preceeding title to this Kingdome, was performed by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the year, 1559) yet he neuer pleaded to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Pradecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long raigne.

Neither ought we to forget or neglect our thankfulness to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britanny to the South, to wit of Scotland to England, which though they were severed but by small brookes and banks, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affliction of the Nations, they were infinitely souered. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Maiestie hath brought with him into this Land: No, put all our petty greivances together & heap them up to their high, thy wil appeare but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since then, haue acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White; for the greatest happinesse; (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdome received from GOD; certainly the peace betweene the two Lions of gold & gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former: for by it, besides the sparing of our british blood, heretofore and during the difference, so often & abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more inabled to recover her ancient honor and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies & conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the years 1588. ioyned the army which hee commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast, & had his Maieſty at the ſame time declared himſelfe againſt vs in the north: it is eaſie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur haue brought this union a farre greater praiſe than it hath ſince coſt vs. It is true, that there was neuer any Common weale or Kingdom in the world, wherein no man had cauſe to lament. Kings live in the world & not about it. They are not infinit to examine euery mans cauſe, or to relieue euery mans wants. And yet in the latter, (though to his owne prejudice) His Maieſtie hath had more compaſſion of other mens neceſſities, than of his own Coſſers. Of whom it may be ſaid as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not vnderſtand with Pineda, ſo be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better ſpoken of His Maieſtie, than of any King that euer Englad had, who as well in diuine, as humane vnderſtanding, haue exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

in Sal. l. 4.

I could ſay much more of the Kings Maieſty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of preſumption, & wihall ſuſpect, that it might befall theſe papers of mine, (though the loſſe were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnſkilfull and common Painters, which by her own commandement were knockt in peeces and caſt into the fire. For ill Artifts, in ſetting out the beauty of the external: and weakes writers in deſcribing the vertues of the internal: doe often leaue to poſterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the moſt perfect and Princely mindes, a moſt defective repreſentation. It may ſuffice, and there needes no other diſcouſe; if the honeſt Reader but compare the cruel & turbulent paſſages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpoſe I haue inſerted this breife diſcouſe) with His Maieſties temperate, reuengelleſſe, and liberal diſpoſition: I ſeey that if the honeſt Reader weigh them iuſtly, and with an euen hand: & wihall but beſtow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He ſhall find, that there is no man that hath ſo iuſt cauſe to complaine, as the King himſelfe hath. Now as we haue tolde the ſucceſſe of the trumpeteries and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great perſonages: ſo we finde, that GOD is euery where the ſame GOD. And as it pleaſed him to puniſh the vſurpation, & vnnatural cruelty of Henry the firſt, & of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: ſo dealt He with the ſons of Loys Debonaire, the ſon of Charls the great, or Charlemaine. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eies of Bernard his Nephew, the ſon of Pepin the eldeſt ſon of Charlemaine, & heire of the Empire, and then cauſed him to die in priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his eldeſt brother: there followed nothing but murders vpon murders, poiſoning, imprifonments, & ciuill waire, till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguiſhed. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelfe of his Nephew by a violent death; & of his baſtard Brothers by a ciuill death (hauing incloſed them with ſure guard, al the daies of their liues, within a Monaftery) held himſelfe ſecure from all oppoſition: Yet God raiſed vp againſt him (which he ſuſpected not) his own ſons, ſo vex him, ſo inuade him, ſo take him priſoner, & to depoſe him; his owne ſons, with whom (to ſatiſſie their ambition)

he had ſhared his eſtate, and giuen them (vpon vs to wear) and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Tea his eldeſt ſon Lothaire (for he had four ſhree by his firſt wife, & one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his depoſition. That he had yſed violence to wards his brothers and kinſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might haue deliuered) to be ſlaine, eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus; et propinquis violentiam intulit, et nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiferit: Becauſe he yſed violence to his Brothers and Kinſmen, & ſuffered his Nephew to be ſlaine whom he might haue deliuered.

Step. Paſquier
reciter, l. 5. c. 1.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe, namely, repent him of his crueltie. For among many other things, which he performed in the Generall Aſſembly of the States, it followes: Poſt hæc autem palam ſe eraffe conſeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſij exemplum, poenitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam Paſq. ibidem. de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat. After this he did openly confeſſe himſelfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodoſius, hee vnder-went voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard his own Nephew.

This he did: and it was praiſe-worthy. But the blood that is vnjuſtly ſpilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, haue but dead reſtwards.

This King as I haue ſaid, had foure ſonnes: To Lothaire his eldeſt he gaue the Kingdom of Italy; as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin the ſecond ſon he gaue the Kingdom of Aquitaine; to Loys, the Kingdom of Bauier; and to Charles, whom hee had by a ſecond wife called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdom of France. But this ſecond wife, being a Mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his ſon Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to graten Charles which, after the death of his ſon Pepin, hee perſequest to effect, againſt his Gracious child bearing the ſame name. In the meane while, being inuaded by his ſon Loys of Bauier, hee dies for grieſe.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bauier, and Charles after wards called the bald, & their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioine in league againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt brother. They fight neare to Auxerre the moſt bloody battaile that euer was ſtroken in France; in which, the maruelous loſſe of Nobility, & men of warre, gaue courage to the Saracens to inuade Italie; to the Hunnes to ſal vp Almaine; & the Danes, to enter vpon Normandy. Charles the bald by reſon ſeizeth vpon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter, Carloman rebells againſt his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eies of his ſon Carloman; Bauier inuades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conſcience, for his rebellions againſt his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monafterie. Charles the Bald, the Vncle, oppreſſeth his Nephewes the ſonnes of Lothaire, hee vſurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Bauier his elder Brother, Bauiers armes and his ſonne Carloman are beaten; hee dies of grieſe, & the vſurper Charles is poiſoned by Zedechias a Jew his Biſhoppian, his ſonne Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drinke. Beque had Charles the ſimple and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breaks his Neck, the younger is slaine by a wild Bore; the son of Bauiere had the same ill destiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions. Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the Jonnes of Debonaire held in Germany; where with not contented, he invades Charles the simple: but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his vnderstanding, he dies a distracted begger. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallaces, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and lastly being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the prison of Peron: Loyses the sonne of Charles the simple breakes his neck in chasing a Wolfe, & of the two Jonnes of this Loys, the one dies of payson, the other dies in the prison of Orleans, after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French makes him selfe King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after he had once appalled iniustice with authority, his sonnes and successours tooke up the fashion, and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torne from their boulders, every man despised them as miserable & naked beggers. The wretched successors they had, (sait a learned French-man) shewes, que en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la multice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the son of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more meddling, than either God, or Iustice had.

But to come nearer home, it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fact) that ever the French men had, did never enjoy him selfe, after hee had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol & Cabrières to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were thereupon burnt and murdered, men, women, and children. It is true that the said King Francis repented him selfe of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his sonne, to do iustice upon the Murderers, threatening his sonne with GODS iudgments, if hee neglected it. But this unreasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry him selfe was slaine in sport by Montgomery, wee all may remember what became of his foure sonnes; Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules, of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And not withstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crowne was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dissolve, the Protestants remaine more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong cities than ever they had.

Let us now see if God be not the same God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowick of Moscouia, were but pettie ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, having beene the most mercilesse. For besides those of his owne blood and Nobility which he caused to be slaine in his owne Court & Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Master of Calatraua, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom he cut in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile, He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cosenger-mans; his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nuges de Guzmá, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mençes de Toledo, Gutierrez his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; & a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived fixteene yeeres, and the other, foureteene, he murdered them there. Nay he spared not his Mother, nor his wifes the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, & the Deane, to be killed of purpose to enjoy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobilitie; that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to leuy (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to retorne withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King, in so much as Pope Urban declared him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having beene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Altramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer beene in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Bishops of Cointance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Prê, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasure, and Request, (with fixtene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to gouerne, and to haue maistr'd France: He was soone after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and miserie found them out.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which lived both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that layd the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; & to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Iabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre, and, contrary to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted therest, as there was no meanes left for any army to invade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne blood, and by double alliance tied vnto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour, under Gonfaluco, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heaven and his owne Honour, to make his sonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world: saw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with childe, with her untimely birth, at once together buried. His eldest daughter married vnto Don Alphoso Prince of Portugall, beheld her first husband breake his necke in her presence; and being with childe by her second, dyed with it. A iust iudgement of God vpon the race of Iohn father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished, who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Duchesse of Viseo The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-duke Philip, turned foole, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eighth, He saw cast off by the King: his mother of many troubles in England; the mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeale shed a world of innocent blood, lost Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude: all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue masters of a new name; and by a strange family are governed and possesst.

Nether. Hist. l. 7. p. 333.

Charles the fifth son to the Arch-duke, Philip, in whose vaine enterprises vpon the French, vpon the Almanes, & other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Capitaines, were consumed: who gaue the world a most perilous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insprug, and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to swallow vp all those dominions wherein hee concocted nothing saue his owne disgraces. And hauing, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in cyther: Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Penitencer of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare to his sonne Philip from whom hee very slowly received his meane and ordinary maintenance.

Hist. of the Netherlands.

His Son againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zealand, wrestled by his ancestors from Iaquelme their lawfull Princeesse) & to possesse in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that mischieuous Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romish Tyrants, not onely forgot the most remarkable seruices, done to his Father the Emperour by the Nobilitie of those countries; not onely forgot the Present made him vpon his entrie, of forty millions of Florens, called the Noualeaide; nor onely forgot, that hee had twice most solemnly sworn to the Generall States, to maintaine and preserve their ancient rights, priuiledges, and customes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirty and five Earles before him. Conditionall Princes of those Provinces: but beginning first to constrainne them, and enbrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impouerish them by many new deuised and intollerable impositions; hee lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make himselfe not onely an absolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France, but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after hee had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his former Oathes (which Dispensation was the true cause of the warre & bloodshed since then; and after hee had tryed what hee could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobilitie, vnder the government of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, the Cardinall Granuile; He employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Capitaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gaure: & Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Bergues, & cut off in those fixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen & others, eighteen thousand & fixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders & massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which hee had failed to performe by force: He sent for gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria; a Prince of great hope, & very gracious to those people. But he, vsing the same Papall aduantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obstrue the treaty made with the Generall States; & to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers, therein garrisoned. Towards whose Pay & Payport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of 600 thousand pounds. Which monies received, He suddenly surprised the Cittadels of Antwerp & Nemeures: not doubting (being vsuspected by the States) to haue possesst himselfe of all the maistring places of those Provinces. For whatsoeuer he ouerly pretended, He held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Escouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, & others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny; formerly practised, & now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect & end of this perimie, & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe; after hee had murdered so many of the Nobilitie; executed (as before said) eighteen thousand fixe hundred in fixe yeeres, & most cruelly slaine Man, Woman, and Childe, in Mecklin, Zurphen, Naerden and other places: & after hee had consumed fixe and thiry millions of treasure in fixe yeares: not withstanding his Spanish rancour, That hee would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milke-tubbs: Hee departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse & detestation of the whole Nation, leauing his Maisters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, then hee found them at his first arriuall. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceits of himselfe ouer-came the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearfull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers iealousie & distrust; with the vntimely death that seized him, euen in the flower of his youth? And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Maister both England & the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, Hee was at the first arriuall, & before any access to the King by certaine Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warre as than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, & successe in this businesse, there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For hee hath paid aboute an hundred Millions & the liues of aboute foure hundred thousand Christians for the losse of all those countries; which for beauty, gaue place to none; & for reuenue, did equall his West Indies: for the losse of a nation, which most willingly obeyed him; & who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despaynt of all his forces become a free Estate, & far more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first beganne to impouerish and oppress them.

The Preface,

Oh by what plots, by what swearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politique subtilty, haue these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD vpon themselves, vpon theirs, and vpon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and scene an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties, as the one could neuer haue hoped for themselves; and the other neuer haue succeeded; if no such opposition had euer bene made. GOD hath sayd it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeite the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or persuade our selues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante; so we neither looke behind vs what hath bene, nor before vs what shal be. It is true that the quantity which we haue, is of the body: we are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The Heauens are high, farre off, and vnsearchable: we haue sense and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondered at, that the words of worthlesse men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Elai cryed out long agoe, Lord, who hath beleueed our reports? And out of doubt, as Elai complained then for himselfe and others: so are they lesse beleueed, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea in the discourse of euery woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an vniuersall dissimulation? We profess that we know GOD: but by wordes we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitude non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the priuate contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murders for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof haue so occupied the World, as it hath well nere driuen the practise thereof out of the world. Who would not soone resolue that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestially habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisy. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in gesture and voyce, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues were-nounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Iustice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good words; but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the marks, which (when we haue bent our consciences to the highest) we all shooe at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we haue gathered the greatest abundance, we our selues enioy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that euer man had, hath told vs that this is the wise: When goods increaseth (sayth Salomon) they also increase that eate them; and what good commeth to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuour the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde; leaving vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Maister Dannet, and vse his owne words. While the Emperour Charles the fift, after the resignatio of his Estates, stayed at Vlushing for winde, to carry him his last iourney into Spaine, He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no body answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and so did, notwithstanding al the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, He sayd thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time enuironed with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domestical seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD; which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the euerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honor done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applaus of the Multitude, but as the outcrie of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer bene applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer bene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herselfe rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foote: the Mantaken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groomme beastes the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberty.

The Preface.

The second is the greatning of our posterity and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind vs. Certainly of those which conceive that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be sayd of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortall shall be once separate from our mortall bodies, & disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their pouerty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vp a Beggars cotage. Neciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filij, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viucentium non interfunt. The dead though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conuerfant with their affaires that remaine. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our sonnes shall bee honourable: neither shall wee vnderstand concerning them, whether they shall bee of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (sayth he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew vnto man, what shall be after him vnder the Sun? He therefore accompteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, so labour and traualle in the world, not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enioy the fruits thereof: which made me (sayth he) endeavour euē to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death God hath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope; seeing the Prophet Elai confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Israel knowes vs not. But bereof wee are assured, that the long and darke night of death, (of whose following day wee shall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) shall couer vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall againe receive Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy, nor any returne of foregone & mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we shall retainē any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; & the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary, If a diuine life retainē any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; we shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their estates greater than euē the World gaue, we shall (by the difference knowne vnto vs) euē detest their consideration. And what ouer comfort shall remaine of all for eua, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised liuing: and in that Piety, Iustice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shal we therefore value honor and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnnescessary & vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees, which hath giuen greater and lesse light and beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betweene beasts and birds: created ted the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub, among stones, giuen the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posterity, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggary: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable succour of other mens pity: I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care. Prauided that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruins. For as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quasitas: so Ieremy cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrighteous counsell, and their chambers without equiety: and Esai the same, Woe to those that spoyle and were not spoyled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Salomon, that he commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence, not to lie in wait for blood, and not to swallow them vp aluie, whose riches we couet: for such are the wayes (sayth hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could afford our selues but so much leisure as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when wee were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for euē: I say, if both so wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being, and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coneyng those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortall, and neglecting those things which are immortall, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man thinke all foolles that cannot equall his abundance; the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not troddē downe their opposites; the Politician, al grosse, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winde drine vs; and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Navigation of this life takes end. Then it is, I say, that our owne cogitations (those sad & seuer cogitations formerly beaten frō vs by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay vs to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then that we crie out to God, for mercy; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty to others: and it is onely then, that we are (stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That God will not be mockt. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be faued; and that God spared not his Angels: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to thinke, that the seuer Commandements of the All-powerfull God were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth vs, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, sayth a reuerend Father, Cum hac spe ad aternos labores & bella descendunt! I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that we ended wel; for we al desire desire (as Balaam did) to see the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a displeasing, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men do not oppose him, disesteem him, and mock him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske him forgiuenesse at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but say vnto God as followeth? We beseech thee O God, that all the fallhoods, forwearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust God; that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall preiudice my sonne (which I am resolved not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue bene vniust, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainly these wise worldlings haue either found out a new God; or made One: and in all likelihoode such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth ware in his Cappe; which when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practise of a Cardinal and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnack to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be redrewards a Leaden, but not towards the euermourning God. But of this composition are all deuout louers of the World, that they feare all that is diuelse and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practises of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they feare the opinions of men which beate but vpon shadowes: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and vnprosperous, be they friends or Kings: yea they die under water, like Ducks, at every pebble stone, that is but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giantlike valour, against the terrible iudgements of the Al-powerfull God: yea they shew themselves gods against God, and slaues towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poore & oppressed, whom we account wretched: we shall find the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subiect to interchange (witness the sodaine downefall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy rising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so vncertaine, whereof to be waile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honor, of his riches, health, or life; but that hee may be deprived of either or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vespere vehat, incertum est, What the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet ye cannot tell, (sayth S. Iames) what shalbe to morrow To day he is set vp, and to morrow he shall not be found: for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersity, be very obscure; yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which enuiroth worldly glory; through which, for the clearnesse thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let aduersity seeme what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make them selues merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those vnder the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that we

haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all we haue reioyced, or be it that we haue measured the same lengths of dayes, and therein haue euermore sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, wee finde both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the we; layed out of sight; and death, which doth pursue vs, & hold vs in chace, from our infancy hath gathered it. Quicquid attatus retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoeuer of our age is past, death holds it: So as who-so-euer he be, to whom Fortune hath bene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the account of his memory (for we haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved eyther of beauty and youth, or some delights; what it hath saued, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatsoeuer else the amorous Spring time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnvaluab; and he shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow vp after our fast-spring youth; ouertake it, when it is at a stand; and ouer-top it utterly, when it begins to stier: in so much as looking backe from the very instant time, & fro our now being the poore, diseased, & captiue creature, hath as little sence of all his former miseries and paines, as he, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures & delights. For whatsoeuer is cast behind vs, is iust nothing; and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it. Omnia quae eueniunt sunt, in incerto iacent. Onely those few blacke Swannes I must except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-lasted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu iustus es in omnibus quae veniunt supernos. And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if he had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs hauing had them; forgetting that humble & iust acknowledgement of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a fool or vngratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meanes soeuer his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soeuer his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, & beare the, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them manlike, and resolutely; & not as those whining souldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, & appointed vs all the parts we are to play; and hath not, in their distribution, bene partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable begger,

a begger begging water of an Enemy, so quench the great drought of death; That appointed Baiazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Foottoole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerius made) so played, being taken by Saporus; that made Bellifarius play the most victorious Captain; & lastly the part of a blinde begger, of which examples many thousands may be produced. Why should other men, who are but as the least wormes, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weakness prize the passages of this world other wise for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenij est reuocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy faine of ours, which foretells in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subiect. Therein it is, that Misfortune & Adversities worke all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, what soeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, so saue it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortuna succumbere, quod tristis est omni fato, to fall vnder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to found a retreat, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the picture of time past (which we call Historie) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine providence, ~~every where found~~ (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) have perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things, to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implyeth the other: Creation, inferring Providence (for what father forsaketh the child that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, haue gone about to disfoyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we vnderſtand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Ariſtotles rotten ground to beare vpon, yet which he hath (notwithſtanding) founded the Defences and Fortrefſes of all his Verball Doctrines: Yet that the neceſſity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impoſſibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Naturall reaſon, wherein he beleeued, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be maruailed at. And it is no leſſe ſtrange, that thoſe men which are deſirous of knowledge (ſeeing Ariſtotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the reſt) haue ſo retrenched their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth, and ſo abſolutely ſubiected themſelues to the law of thoſe Philoſophicall principles: as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the ſearch of cauſes, they haue condemned either for phantaſticall, or curiouſ. But doubt it follow, that the poſitions of Heathen Philoſophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed.

The Preface.

indeed, because so called? Or that infinite eternitie, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in every question of Nature, and finite power, may be approved for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For such Charron in his booke of Charron de sagesse. *Wisdom*e, Tout proposition humaine a estat d' authorite quel autre, si la raison n' on fait la difference; Every humane proposition hath equall authority, it reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But herof how shall the upright and impariaill iudgements of man give a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adiungunt, qui sine villo iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab alijs pecudum more ducuntur. They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any judgement approve the invention of those that fore-went them; & suffer themselves, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dulnesse ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophie, Physick, and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the first, Contra negatum Principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer be perswaded, that God hath shewt vpp all light of Learning within the lambeorne of Aristotles braines: nor that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendami in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectu: that God hath giuen inuention to the H. Faubers, and that they onely inuaded Nature, and found the strength and bottomes thereof: the same Nature hauing consumed all her flore, and left nothing of price to man's sight. That thele and thele be the causes of thele and thele effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience, without Art. The Obiects of my knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that soure Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the iowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions: But man to couer his ignorance in the last things, whocanot giue a true reason for the Grafer of his feete, why it should be greener rather than red; or of any other colour, that could neuer yet discover the way and reason of Nature's working in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe, who is farre more Noble than the Heauens themselves: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discerne the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learne, than to die that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action & effect telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as be) but not what it is, which neither he nor any else, doubt know, but GOD that created it: (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not, 13. 26.

and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Man-kinde had a beginning of being. He will disabie Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the moethes of the Aire for a cause, caſt the worke on neceſſity or chance; beſtow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and laſtly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternal: which latter opinion Aristotle to make himſelfe the Author of a new Doctrin, brought into the World: and his Sectatours haue maintained it; parati ac coniuati, quos ſequuntur, Philoſophorum animis inuictis opinionones tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or ſoone after Moſes, Zoroaſter, Muſæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Meliſſus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whole opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the neceſſitie of inuincible reaſon, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuerſall. Horum omnium ſententia quamuis ſit incerta, eodem tamen ſpectat, vt Prouidentiam vnā eſſe conſentiant. ſiue enim Natura, ſiue Aether, ſiue Ratio, ſiue mens, ſiue fatalis neceſſitas, ſiue diuina Lex; idem eſſe quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All theſe mens opinions (ſaith Laſtatiu) though vncertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence; whether the ſame be Nature, or light, or Reaſon, or vnderſtanding, or deſtine, or diuine ordinance, that it is the ſame which we call G O D. Certainly, as all the Riuers in the world, though they haue diuers riſings, and diuers runnings; though they ſome times hide themſelues for a while vnder ground, & ſeeme to be loſt in Sea-like Lakes; doe at laſt finde, & fall into the great Ocean; ſo after all the ſearches that humane capacitie hath, & after all Philoſophicall contemplation and curioſitie; in the neceſſitie of this infinite power, all the reaſon of man ends and diſſolues it ſelfe.

As for others, and firſt touching thoſe, which conceiue the matter of the World to haue bene eternall, and that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexiſtente: the Suppoſitiō is ſo weak, as it hardly worth the anſwering. For (ſaith Euſebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere, They ſeeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: in ſomuch as if God had not found this firſt matter by chance. He had neither bene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuerſall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternall: it then followes, That either this ſuppoſed Matter diſſidit it ſelfe to God, or God, accommodate himſelfe to the matter, For the firſt; it is impoſſible, that things without ſenſe could proportion themſelues to the Workmans will. For the ſecond; it were horrible to conceiue of God, That as an Artiſicer he applyed himſelfe, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted vpon.

But let it be ſuppoſed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wiſe: I would gladly learne how it came to paſſe, that the ſame was proportionable to his inſention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wiſe; & no more, nor no leſſe, than ſerued to receiue the forme of the Vniuerſall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was ſufficient; then muſt it be græued, That God created out of nothing ſo much of new matter, as ſerued to finiſh the worke of the World: Or had there bin more of this matter than ſufficed; then God did diſſolue & annihilate whatſoever remained, and was ſuperfluous. And this muſt every reaſonable ſonable ſoule confeſſe, That it is the ſame worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the ſame art and power, and by none other, can thoſe things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which thoſe things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to ſay that this matter was the cauſe of it ſelfe, this of all other, were the greateſt idoliſme. For, if it were the cauſe of it ſelfe at any time; then there was alſo a time when it ſelfe was not: at which time of not being, it is eaſie enough to conceiue, that it could neither procure it ſelfe, nor any thing eſſe. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impoſſible. Nihil autem ſeipſum præcedit, neq; ſeipſum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth præcede it ſelfe, neither doe bodies compound themſelues.

For the reſt; Thoſe that ſaie this matter to be eternall, muſt of neceſſity confeſſe, that Infinite cannot be ſeparate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the firſt matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For conſequence of this part, whoſoever will make choice, rather to beleue in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madnes of the kind, as wanteth tearmes to expreſſe it. For what reaſon of man (whom the curſe of preſumption hath not ſuppoſed) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of ſhadow, quia comprehenſio eſt intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it ſelfe, either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if ſuch had bene Gods will) as the Sea hath ſands? For where the power is without limitation, the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Tea Reaſon it ſelfe findes it more eaſie for infinite power, to deliuer from it ſelfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a ſoule and diſt, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. Thy are Dionyſius his words; Deus in vna exiſtentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Eſſe omnium eſt ipla Diuinitas, omne quod videtur, & quod non videtur; to wit, cauſaliter, or in better tearmes, non tanquam forma, ſed tanquam cauſa vniuerſalis. Neither hath the world vniuerſall cloſed vpon all of G O D. For the moſt part of his workes (ſayth Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wiſedome be opened, by the glorious worke of the world, which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes; That wee ſeldome entitle G O D the all-ſhewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for thoſe, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not ſo ſaluage therin, as thoſe are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmative; and the making, impoſed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing nothing is made. But ſeeing their great Doctōr Aristotle himſelfe confeſſeth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quafi quoddam rerum principium, iplumq; infinitum, That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the ſame to be infinite; and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius eſt nullum, ſed iplum omnium cernitur eſſe principium, & omnia complecti ac regere: it is ſtrange that this Philoſopher, with his followers, ſhould rather make choice out of all boord, to conclude uſſuſ; than out of truth, to reſolue truly. For if wee compare the world vniuerſall, and all the unmeasurable Orbes of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum, it may truly be said of them all, which himselfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui delruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, & Empedocles, call the world vniuersal, but particulam Vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuersality and the infinity it selfe; & Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to proue the worlds eternity, vrge this Maxime, That, A sufficient & effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring that God being for euer a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue bene for euer; so wit, the world vniuersal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to cōfesse a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent; & the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion; to make God free in power, & bound in wil; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor vnderstanding; which cannot but worke matter being present; as fire, so burne things combustible. Again he thus disputeth, That euery Agent which can worke, and doth not worke; if it afterwarde worke, it is either thereto moued by it selfe, or by some what else; and so it passeth from power to Act. But God (sayth he) is immouable, and is neither moued by himselfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the same, doth alwaies worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by God, that he was for euer the cause thereof; and therefore eternall. The answer to this is euery eate; For that Gods performing in due time that, which he euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be sayd to be eternall; which the Platonicks call, spirituale mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idea and Creation in time. Spiritus ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus. That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the famplar of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was æqually ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer shal be. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting; and in this it doth agree, that it shall befor euer to come. The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no other wise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shal be a new Heauen and a new Earth; without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not vnworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternall and vnchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth,

That

The Preface.

That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissolvable) is continued, & knitt to the Diuine Being, by an individual & inseparable power, flowing from diuine vntie; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knitt together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue, and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (sayth he) is not capable of; but receiveth it from the diuine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successively euery moment by little & little; euen as the whole Materiall World is not altogether, but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a Riuer, seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall deny that euer it shall haue any end, and to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer seene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the older by continuance; or in any sort other wise than they were; which had they bene subject to finall corruption, some change would haue bene discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they will continue for euer as they are. And if coniectural arguments may receiue answer by coniectures; it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken; or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sunnes heate, neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which we Navigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Sunnes violent heate.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certaine, That stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged vp out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue bene buried by the generall flood; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleued, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mynes, and Rocks, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times haue not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we looke for in Celestiall and quint-essentiall bodies? And yet we haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We haue neither Gyants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue, which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface, would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of prooffe; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can be made to this objection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisedome, but that every Nature had bene alike eternall; and Man more rational than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all? why should haughty bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betwene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progress once in every yeare: the Moone to lie by borrowed light: the first Stars (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Nails in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited, given light vnto, and releined all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternity: He may iustly be called eternall Charity, and euermolting Love. The same may be sayd of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also be called eternall vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and begger; and man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to belence againe in the old Play of the gods? Tis in more gods by Millions, than euer Heliodorus dreamt of. But in steed of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discern it better; That the Sun, Moone, Stars, & the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they haue not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit. Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles phisicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphisicks; I say that the best is but nominall, and seruing onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academics open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the first place to Prouidence, the second to Fate, and bus the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia propiæ; Natura postremum. Bus be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yes, that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath a worded. For this is vnanisworable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam, Heonely can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

Bus the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest vbiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materijs, diuersa facere: sublata vero mediõrũ materiãrumq; diuersitate, vel vnicũ, vel simi-

linum operatur, neque potest quandoq; ad se materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diuersity of matter, so workes all these variable workes of Heauen and Earth, it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne, reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to gouerne: without which all things had bene but one and the same; all of the matter of Heauen; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this vnderstanding, this counsaile, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men haue notion, and giue the first and highest place to diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnemq; summum locum diuino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it bus in termes. For it is God that only disposeth of all things according to his owne will; and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honor and dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God, that doth good vnto all, knowing and louing the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it selfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heauy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the salt Sea? Shall we terme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in the fire: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh; and therefore seeing all things worke as they do, (call it by Force, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they worke by an impulsio, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. Bus herein lyes the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things; and such a faculty, as neither knowing is selfe the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath, doth yet worke all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore euery reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith, and Reason, without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which haue bene deliuered by diuine letters, as the waters waters of a running river do successively pursue each other frō the first fountains.

This much I say it is that Reason it selfe hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapientia goes before, Religion followes: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience Plato calleth absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another, scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (sayth Hlidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. Leonfesse it, That to enquire further as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world: Or of his secret iudgements, and the causes; is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione insanunt, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it: For as it is no shame nor dishonor (sayth a French Author) de faire arrest au but qu'on n'auceu turpaster, For a man to rest himselfe there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so whatsoeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledge it to be so; as vnderstanding it selfe not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, so be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his owne Art. For seeing both Reason & Necessity teach vs (Reason, which is vrs diuini spiritus in corpus humanum mersi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and seeing the same Reasons and Necessity make vs know, that the same infinite power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs our beleefe her. of is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells vs, that such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceiued by man.

I haue bene already ouer-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defectiue. Among the grossest, the vnjustifiable diuision of the bookes, I can't not know how to excuse, had I not bene directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euently of those things, which are subiect to number and measure. For the rest, it suites well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which speake too much, and yet say little; Ipse nobis furto lubducinatur, We are stolen away from our selues, setting a high price on all that is our owne. But heresof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I beleuee as he doth; that who so thinks himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves from selfe loue, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counsaile from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take vp the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity. Some few enterprises greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that ouercame the consuming disease of time; and preserued it selfe from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which haue beene here and there in the same times; I am drinen to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appeare here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inuentions therein found, and from them deriued to vs: though most of the Authors Names, haue perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Government: they had Kingly rule, Nobility, Policy in war, Navigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speake therefore of these (seeing in a generall History we should haue left a great deale of Nakednes, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is that I haue made also many others: which if they shall be layd to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing we digresse in all the wayes of our liues: yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their liues & actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of History, and of the Kindes.

The same hath bene taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater breuiety, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. (Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and euery day preacht vnto vs. But we still make large digressions: yea, the teachers themselves doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance then were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so florished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereunto. The like obseruance was to be vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affaires of Rome, whilst the Romans grew more mighty then the Greekes.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was knowne of them from their seuerall beginnings in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I haue followed the best Geographers: who seldome giue names to those small brookes, whereof many, ioyned together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become vnted, and run in maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, & the Stile not euery where like it selfe; the first shewes their legitimation and true Parents, the second will excuse it selfe vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili uera, vsed stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be layd to my charge that I vsed diuers Hebrew words in my first booke, and elsewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in latine Character in S. Senensis; and of these I haue borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had bin beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at, hauing had a eleuen yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; Howsoever, I know that it will be sayd by many, That I might haue bene more pleasing to the Reader, if I had writt the Story of mine owne times, hauing bene permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that whosoever in writing a moderne History shall follow truth too neare the heels, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and seruants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himselfe; and he that walkes after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course Temper or Basenesse. It is true, that I neuer trauailed after mens opinions, when I might haue made the best vse of them: and I haue now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreame ambition, or extreame cowardise, or both, do yet, (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, betwene the bed and the graue. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and taxe the vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead; and haue it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting the ouer anew; they shall therein accuse themselves iustly, & me falsely.

For I protest before the Maiesty of God, That I malice no man vnder the Sun. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subiection to their private passions; but that they seeme diuers persons, in one & the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Vnus mihi propopulo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the seruice of that inestimable Prince Henry, the sweetest hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I vnder-tooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Maister: from which al that is presented, hath received both blowes and thanks, Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicij, in quo his secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will indge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present aduersity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; & therefore haue not far to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall priuation there is no recovery to habit; so it is seldom seen in the priuation politike. I do therefore forbeare to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly; thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases; yet shall we euermore be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion, al the hope I haue lies in this, That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Loue towards them, and well-deseruing of them, than euer I shall do againe. For had it bene otherwise, I should hardly haue had this leasure, to haue made myselfe a foole in print.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§. I.

That the invisible God is scene in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power vneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clari-tie inuisible; an Vnderstanding, which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute purenesse and simplicitie; was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the won-derfull magnitude whereof, (all which Hee embraceth, fil-leth, and sustayneth) we behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heauen, we perceiue a shadow of his diuine Countenance; in his merciful prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World vniuersall, by the absolute Arte of his owne Word, his Power and Almightinesse, which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and varietie of Celestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuersities; Celestiall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the Omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almightie Mouer.

In these more then wonderfull works, God (saith Hugo) speaketh vnto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that liue, witness in them-sclues; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules:
for according to S. GREGORY, Omnia homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ra-tione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Euery man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob), which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspiciere in creaturis; To discern him in his prouidence by his Creatures. That God hath bene otherwise scene, to wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my vnderstand-ding,

the weaknesse of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things, which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers: but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable Vniuersall; so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heauen, or whatsoever else (not himselfe) was increate & eternall: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seate of infinite power, no more then infinite power it selfe can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can containe: How great is the house of God (saith BARUCH) how large is the place of his possession: it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmesurable.

Calim. in comment. fol. 224. Opera.

Calim. in Gen.

But leaving multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable & allowed, that by the words Heauen and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the Heauens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which conuered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilitas, sive possessio. Which matter (saith Calim) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the Vniuersall: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by MOSES understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of conformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heauen.

MOSEs first nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aque ad iucunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulness.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures exspect: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is vnder the Moone, and subiect to alteration. Corrupt feedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heavens are not subiect, though subiect to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Ezay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters vnder the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the drie Land appeare: which proueth that the drie Land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or feede of the Earth, much lesse of the Vniuersall. Intritu Domine terram fundasti, T thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith David. And if by naturall arguments it may be proued, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth vs also, that earth rarified may become water: water, air: air, fire; and so on the contrarie. Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the substance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beautie and ornament. Calum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrewes call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specifically water; but the figure more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aqua f. cit. For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name of word the Latines wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters.

Gen. 1. 2.

Or this Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters: And the earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retaineth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which seedeth seede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute

attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecta Dei perfecta sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their inuention of Demogorgon: Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Ouid:

Ante Mare, & Terram, & (quod regit omnia) Calum, Vnus erat toto natura vultus in Orbe,
Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaq; moles.

Ouid. Met. l. 1.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heauen, that all doth hide,
In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heape.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood that the Spirit of God moued upon the Waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

AFTER the Creation of Heauen and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued upon the Waters. The Sacrent interpreters vñ the word superferebatur, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fovebat (saith Iherome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recens. bo (saith Basil): which words incubare or fovere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatum est ab auiibus pullitici sine incubantibus, quamuis spirituali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their yong, not corporally, but in a spiritual and vnexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus à conspectu Dei susflabat: or as other vnderstand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, remanebat: The wind from the face of God did blow vnder, drine, or remove, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalme: He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elohim Merachefet, id est, efficitur motibus consensu, ac agitur super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warme, and cherishing, quickning and stirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and materiall, to wit, Causa, which is the diuine goodnesse: tehu, which is, stat, sive erit, Let it be, or it shall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id est, vñ quædam diuina, agilis ac presens per omnia pertingens, omnia complex, that is, A certayne diuine power, or strength enery where, active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Aim, id est, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my selfe I am resolu'd (Cum Deus sit superrationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason about reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull wayes of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans vnderstanding, yet the manner & first operation of his diuine power, cannot be conceiued by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortall body. Animalis homo quæ Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esaie) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: so are his wayes (according to S. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitalitie and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely knowne to God, Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potestatem, intellectus noster non caput; For how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Vbiqutic) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our vnderstanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemq; distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius maiestatis æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference betwene God and Man, if mans vnderstanding could conuenie the counsels and disposing of that eternall Maiestie; and therefore to bee ouer-curious in searching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gaue forme to the Matter of the Vniuersall, is a labour and search like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and safe Foord, will presume to passe ouer the greatest Riuer in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his vnderstanding. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selues safely, while we stand neare the fire; but if we seeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiositie: this is true, that the English word (moued) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with MIRANDVLA, Vis causa efficientis; The force of the efficient cause, S. AUGUSTINE sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, vnder the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: AMERARIUS nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: ANAXAGORAS, Mentem: TO STATVS, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh Animam mundi; The soule of the world: and in his fixt Booke de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heauen; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Sauour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mea tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde sayleth, my voice is silent, and not mine only, but euen the voice of Angels: to may all men so elfe say in the vnderstanding, and vterance of the wayes and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed consubstantialis illi est, quicquid eius est, & quicquid est; Whatsoeuer attribute of him there is, and whatsoeuer he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is.

Nazian. lib. 1.
Thal.

But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustayneth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuersall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith SALOMON. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus suo presentia esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod, si se- grebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum desierent vniuersa; God gi- ueth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

Virg. AEnid.
lib. 6. 714.

*Principio Cælum ac Terras, camposque, liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Luna, Titaniasq; astra, Spiritus intus alit: totamq; insula per artus,
Atens agitat molem, & magno se corpore miscet.*

The Heauen, the Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,
The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,
A Spirit within maintaynes: and their whole masse,
A Mind, which through each part infused doth passe,
Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Vniuers.

And this was the same Spirit, which moued in the Vniuersall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heauens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in them their spiritualitie, and natural motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarification, and subtilitie of parts. By this Spirit (which gaue heate and motion, and thereby, operation to euery nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element superior, as lighter then the waters, through whose vast, open, subtil, diaphanick, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might easily transpierce: Light, for the excellency thereof, being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vitall Operation, Aquis à Deo instam, ex qua aqua non solum motio- nem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vitall Operation giuen by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth liuing Creatures.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and diffi- cultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

These waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vniued, and called the Sunne, the Or- gan, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes crea- tion, and the vniued of the dispersed light therein. This is proued by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of Heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the first Verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures there- in: Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, & other lights of heauen: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that Light it selfe, Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it selfe & all things else visible) but a body most illighted, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Aether, the place of the sup- posed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressum: The conductor, and preseruer or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or meanes of light. Aristotle calleth light, a qualitie, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better auouched of the heate, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (say the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine residet in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be depriued of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academics make incorporall, and so doth MONTAIGNE, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaueth.

Aristotle findeth corporalitie in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Piccolominius, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, Pic. de finit. Heauen to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other Cristalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by vncleane, and vnpure earthly substances, lesse hard, and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quod obiaculum naturæ terrenæ atq; sordidum, non capit candidum luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle, by nature earthly and foule, doth not receiue the pure cleanness of light: alluding to that most diuine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly drossie, and humane vncleannesse.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselves therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hereof, but there is no man that hath bene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Bede, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his owne iudgement herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the Schoole-men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtil in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophie or Diuinitie: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientie odiosius acumi- ne nimio; Nothing is more odious so true wisdom, then too acute sharpnesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought brought forth and denoured) resolved vs, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they say it cannot bee, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet every day we see the aire enlightened: incorporall it cannot bee, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed: others say, (as Petrus) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, lucide or bright, darke or opaque, Diaphanous or transparent; but darknesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darknesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtayne their so being of the light; and therefore, if we deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely, and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

But in my vnderstanding, Lumen, (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentional Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heauen, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof, and an intentional Species may be vnderstood by the example of a red, or Greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or Greene glasse: for then we perceiue the same colour cast vpon any thing opaque; which rednesse or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet vnderstood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, bee the same which the Sunne inhollandeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer then till the Sunnes creation.

But by the most wise and vntouched order, which God observed in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: for Matheus repeateth twice the mayne parts of the vniuersall; first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were also endued with forme. first, naming the Heauens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heauens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vntouched, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vertuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beautie, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vntied, and set in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God finde cause why it should moue (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heate, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite every part of the inferiour world; by his heate to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue activity to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordaind; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull Word he approued, and approuing it, disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Ion, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enioy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Esdras). And these which inhabit the Heauens, doe onely know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res were sunt in Herm. mundo inuisibili, in mundo visibili umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the inuisible world, in the world visible, but their shadowes: Surely, if this Light be not spirituall, yet it approacheth nearest vnto spirituality; and if it haue any corporalitie, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for how soeuer, it is of all things seene, the most beautifull, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministreth to men, and other creatures, all celestiaall influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintayneth; it discouereth vnto vs the glorious works of God, and carryeth vp with an Angelicall swiftnesse, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible maruailes, may continually trauaile to surmount these perceiued Heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, (seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem vides omnia mundus,

Ouid. Met. lib. 1.

The World discernes it selfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longest yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beautie, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be perceiued. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour said to be that Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimity, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus perfectio non mens est, at verò ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith Hermes in Poemandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Masse and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and informed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God enlightened: the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine vertue) brought forth the bud of the herbe that feedeth feede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be vntied, and gaue it also motion and heate, which heate caused a continuance of those severall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the middest of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate about this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmentum, or expansum (for so Varatius, Pagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the Crystalline Heauens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Rasius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against against this fancy. For the waters above the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire above vs, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamaym, being indifferently taken for the Heaven and for Aire, and more properly for the Aire and ether, then for the Heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab infima crassa distincta, intersesta, disjunct, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being secured and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters above the Firmament, exprest in the word Majym, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters about the Aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same.

And that the word Heaven is vsed for the Aire, the Scriptures euerywhere witness, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalme. * By these Springs shall the fowle of the Heaven dwell; and * upon Sodom and Gomorrha is rayned brimstone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Isaacs blessing to Jacob, God give thee therefore of the dew of Heaven; and in Deuteronomie the 11. But the land whither you goe to possesse it, is a land, that drinketh water of the rayne of Heaven; and in Iob, Who hath endred the frosts of Heaven; and in S. MATTHEW, Behold the Fowles of Heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven, &c. And in this very place Basil auoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne words be these; Et vocantur Firmamentum caelum. Hec appellatio alij quidem proprie accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the Starry Heaven) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude: and if there were no other prooffe, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heaven, the words of MOSES in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, makes it manifest: for in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the 20. Verse he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Ayre, in these words: And let the Fowle flye upon the earth in the open firmament of Heaven. And what vse there should be of this ycie, or crystalline, or watery Heaven, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in verie truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of beliefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and faith it selfe (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conductor, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can belecue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius, and of this watery Heaven, Basilus Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his second Booke, and fixt Chapter. For my selfe, I am perswaded, that the waters, called, The waters about the Heavens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendered in the vppermost Ayre.

¶ I. X.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter, of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished and gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, diuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. In the last three daies, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their seedes in themselves; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preferred.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor forme the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

NO for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and facultie, which God hath infused into euery creature, hauing no other seite-abilitie, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it wooed by the Helme and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the iudgement, which allo directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoever they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde onely, that giueth abilitie, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men, as by severall Organs, severall effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and disperse what they haue receyued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euerywhere-prefence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumental causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether silent, vertueless, and dead: of which excellentie ORPHEVS; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues praye him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his owne vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolish by selfe-flatterie) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdome of the Philosophers) Si facultas inuenienda veritatis huic studio subiaceret, aliquando esset inuenta; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenijs in eius inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue bene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdome there to be had. Nam si de vna re cyprian. de mun-practica scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concurrence, it hath not bene taught, neyther are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimatur potentia, que nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subseelum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrarie to all reason, diuine and humane: onely it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betwene matter and forme, then betwene heate and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of rationall consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wroote and peruer the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to procure a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to affirme with Saint AVGVSTINE, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, whatsoeuer is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seedes of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, a quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscunq; generis est, cuiuscunq; estimationis est, a quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

And, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an ineuitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerful then it is, by giuing it Dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Iuuenal:

Sernus regna dabunt, captiuis Fata triumphos.*

Gainst Fate no counsell can preuaile.
Kingdomes to Slaues by Destinie,
To Captiues triumphs giuen be.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillians, the Bardisani, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist: Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiall Orbes, vnchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rationall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and ineuitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vnoquoq; nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lor of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vlt, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunne-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and colde, are not so vncertaine by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to colde earth, to plants and Stones, Mineralles, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should we robbe the beautiful Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beautie and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treasure of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euery Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautie the earth alone, and to couer & shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the vse of man and beaſt, to feed them and cure them; so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorne it, but for instruments and Organs of his diuine providence, so farre as it hath pleased his iust will

to determine. Origin vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. Gen. 1. 5. affirmeth, that the Starres are not causes (meaning perhance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I beleue well, and this saying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things than these be; and we haue scene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacite of men, wee know somewhat, yet in the true and vttermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our senses see and see, and which grow vnder our feet, wee are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestiall bodies. for hardly (saith Salomon) can we discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before vs: who can then inuigilate the things that are in Heauen? Multum est de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a litle of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heauehen we do not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessitie of destinie, so on the contrarie, we doe not robbe those beautiful creatures of their powers and offices; for on the contrary of these second causes depoyled God of his prerogative, or had God himselfe come strayed the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiall inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were iustifiable; of whom Saint AVGVSTINE Impius peruersitate in malis factis rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius autem iudicandum, quam commissorem scelerum. Where we reprehend them of euill deeds, they againe with wicked peruerseness urge, that rather be the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accused.

But that the Starres and other celestiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion; it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (saith Damasce) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones, The heavenly bodies (saith hee) make in vs habitus, complexiones, and dispositions: for the bodie (though Galen inforce it further) hath vnderobedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in Humour, and weak in vertues; for those of cholerick complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported; where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassalls, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse mind I am resolu'd; for of all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites, ouer all which, celestiall bodies (as instruments and Executors of Gods providence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who litle differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as hee that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur satum si resistas, vincis si contempseris: Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it, if thou neglect it, it conquereth.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (saith Saint AVGVSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose). And Saint AVGVSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but hee auoucheth not, that superiour bodies haue rule ouer mens mindes, which are incorporeall.

But howsoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferiour bodies, no more then the signes of raine and winde doe alwaies come to passe. And it is diuers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in Iuuenis patrum virtus; In the young offspring the Fathers vertues; and so the contrarie, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Egregia

Egregia est soboles, scelerato nata parente.

A worthe sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education: doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing vp may fashion anew and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reines being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiarie, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will euer retain a savour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cleanse the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet savour of vertue first receyued, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found to exceede vertuous or vicious, Heauen and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the seedes of vertue may by the art and husbandrie of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the strength of selfe-nature and kind could haue yielded them; so the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themselves into weedes, by being set in a soyle sutable, and like themselves, are made more vnfauourie and filled with payson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapientia adiuvabit opus astrorum, quemadmodum agricola terra naturam; A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyle. And Ptolomie himselfe confelleth thus much, Sapientia, & amina sapientis medici dominabuntur astris, A wiseman, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall prevaile against the Starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the rest of the Vniuersal, whose influences may be called his reserved and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs consider how they bind: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet these Lawes doe not depriue Kings of their natural or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a seuer execution, as that there should be nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or confidence: the Law in his owne nature, being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himselfe, which his Substitutes enioy; God being mercie, goodnesse, and charitie it selfe. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Sauour taught; And let vs not be led into temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had bene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and desires may not make frustrate, and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Destinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependencie, that God himselfe should in a kind haue shut vp himselfe therein: How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. AUGUSTINE) left altogether without hope!

And if this strength of the Starres were so transferred, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be hee Pagan or Christian that so beleueeth, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginarie gods of the other would thereby be depoyled of all worship, reuerence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised vs the reward of well-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I haue finished the worke which thou gauest mee to doe;) and the same God, who hath threatned vnto vs the sorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be so vnjust, as to bind vs inuitably to the Destinies or influences of the Starres, or subiect our soules to any imposed necessitie. But it was well said of Platinius, that the Starres were significant, but not efficient, giuing them yet something lesse then their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God vertuelesse: so I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures; for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receive influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes clartie, and that of the Starres is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen lumini; Light is the shadow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Prouidence, Prefcience, and Predetermination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for every man hath not obserued it, though all learned men haue.

Prefcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Prouidence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prefcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selues fore-know, except the same be to succcede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prefcience of God (as it is Prefcience onely) is not the cause of any thing futerly succeding: neyther doth Gods foreknowledge impose any necessitie, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the World shall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Haruest, and that according to the seuerall seedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neyther doth the knowledge in vs binde or constrain the Sunne to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men perfwade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subiect to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their owne nature. And againe out of the same Authour; Diuina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia euenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & poena malorum periret; Diuine Prouidence (saith he) imposeth no necessity vpon things that are to exist, for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of euil.

§. XIII.

of Prouidence.

Now Prouidence (which the Greekes call Prœnoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prefcience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Prouidence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is diuided into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and wee our selues account such a man for prouident, as, remembering things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, prouide for the future, and times succeding. That such a thing there is as Prouidence, the Scriptures euery-where teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure vs hereof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Prouidence of God: yea the Turkes themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death therein doe manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture prouoing prouidence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (saith DAVID) which covereth the Heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow vpon the Mountaines, which giueth to beasts their food, and feedeth the young Ravens that cries: All these wait vpon thee, that thou mayest giue them food in due season. And thou shalt drinke of the River Cheareth (saith God to ELIA) and I haue

PETER, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his indgements are written, saith DAVID.

1 Reg. 23. 7. 4.

God therefore, who is euenie where present, who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance against them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transfired his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not give my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euenie where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuersall Prouidence is seene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beaats and birds and all liuing for their young ones. If prouidence bee found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Vniuersall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beaats, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whole Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuersall: Amor diuinus reum omnium est principium, & vinculum vniuersi (saith PLATO.) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; eius immobile sustentaculum, ac vniuersae machine fundamentum; The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chayne of the world, and the immouable pillar of euery part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the vniuersall. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only prouide for all, and sustaine all; so as to absolute power; to euenie where presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute transcendent habilitie of Prouidence is only proper and belonging.

Of Predestination.

NOW for Predestination; we can difference it no otherwise, from Prouidence and Preseence, then in this, that Preseence only fore-seeth: Prouidence fore-seeth & careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, euen from the brightest Angels of Heauen, to the vnworthiest Wormes of the Earth, and Predestination (as it is vsed specially by Diuines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their saluation properly, in the common vse of Diuines, or perdition, as some haue vsed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom S. Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, vseth these words, Quarum est vna, quae praedestinata est in aeternum regnare cum Deo, altera aeternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is so vndergoe euertlasting torment with the Deuill: for according to Nonius Marcellus, destinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanan, Daneus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leaue them to the Diuines, and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregorie, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his owne infirmity perceyeth the reason of his blindness. And againe with S. AVASTINE, Occulta esse causa potest, inuisa esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, vnusht it cannot be.

of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by fortune, and against Reason and Prouidence.

EARLY, seeing Destinie or Necessitie is subsequent to Gods prouidence, and seeing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei Organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The instrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune, or Chance: a Goddesse, the most reuerenced, and the most reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Aestheniacks. The Greekes call her tyche, signifying a relative being, or beiding, so as before Homers time this great Ladie was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward the grew lo great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggers and Cottages, the ordered all things, refuting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous, inasmuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her pastimes: of which * PALLADIVS, Vita hominum ludus fortune est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsells haue equal successe to those by the best iudgement conducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience: wherof Athenaeus:

Longisimè à Sapientia Fors distidet, Sed multa perficit tamen similitudo

From Wisdome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and endeuours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be giuen, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of P. LATO: Nihil est artem sub sole, cuius causa legitima non praecesserit, Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatfoeuer may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris, (to wit, the ordinance of God); and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Voce fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God; and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the Law of Murder. He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death, and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby another is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs, the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hercof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi, The soule of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdom, which we expresse by the name of God, governing euery being as well in heauen as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gaue the title of Necessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by inuincible ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certain causes. To this effect (speaking S. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis, the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, difference by diuers termes, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diuersly.

But it may be objected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend vpon so many vnworthy and empty-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without kernell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and dejected estates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partialitie of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our felues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue: for whofoeuer is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth; if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourse then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euer more hang vnder the wheele; which kinde of deferuing well and receiuing ill, we alwaies fully charge Fortune withall. For whofoeuer shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not iust; the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire; shall neuer be made a Counsellor, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperitie; but he must also change with the successe, if he be of contrarie qualities; faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an obsecrunt flauish course? These men hauing nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondering at other men, and by making them beleue that all their vices are vertues, and all their dustie actions crySTALLINE, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis inspicies arrogantia & plausibus capitur; Euerie foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause: so as whofoeuer will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obsecrunt them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrarie, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the authour of his owne miserie; but best it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Heretic raged:

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While furie gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QUINTUS, Potuisse (saith PETRARCH) in lectula suo mori, potuisse integro caduere sepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and bene with an vntorne and vndifferenced bodie buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quam desperantem (praesertim de effectu) litibus persequi implicari; What more foolish then for him that despaires, especially of the effect, to be intangled with endless contentions? Whofoeuer therefore will set before him MACHIAVELLS two markes to shooe as (to wit) riches, and glorie, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first deuised to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did eyther so proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne inuention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sayles, as the diuers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sayles and his cloth, of meane length and bredth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whatfoeuer Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let vs resolute with S. PAUL, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diuersties of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

10 THe creation of all other creatures being finished, the heauens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let vs make man in our owne Image, according to our likeness.

Gen. 1. 26.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to vs knowne, ingen miraculum homo, Man is the greatest wonder (saith PLATO out of METAPHYSICS) Natura ardentissima artificum, The artificial worke of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellencie external, but in respect of his internal forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence immortall, and 'spirituall; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

More holy then the rest, and vnderstanding more,
A liuing creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, 30 Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Vt sciet Deus vnus, ab eo fieret homo vnus, & quomodo ex Deo vno omnia, ita ex vno homine omnes gentes esset super faciem totius terra: Vnus igitur vnus fecit, qui unitatis eius habet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be vpon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should haue the Image of his unitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plural number, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the intage of God in respect of his immortall soule onely, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible; as God is immortall and incorporall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorporall; and as there is but one God which gouerneth the world, so but one soule which gouerneth the bodie of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the bodie: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole bodie, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotleians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Iewes make (saith Tassius) and these resemblances, betwene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

50 The Schoole-men resemble the MInde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the MInde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Vnderstanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude duers; and againe, they distinguish betwene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threads, with subtle distinctions, many times the plainestesse and sinceritie of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that catcheth thiorow and dissolueth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantiall, but not the the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declaratum; A word declaring qualitie in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inter'd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the finall soule doth not therefore leaue to be the image of God, but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Angustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by linne, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

1. Cor. 15. 49.

But howsoever the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceive, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we 10 bear the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoeuer Lombard hath said to the contrarie. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as S. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so S. James vseth the word (similitude) for both in these words: I therewith blesse we God euen the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Angustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegance in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Consequitur imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confesse that this image is found 20 in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi vero posset esse imago aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where neither so likeness, there is no image. The verie words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) onely, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe 30 by it selfe, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Coloss. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Syrrides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleue S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the wordes directly in one sense. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Rom. 1. 13.

Zanch. de op. Dei l. 3. ca. 1.

In Gen.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both in bodie and minde: Nulla pars in homine que non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of bodie and soule. The bodie of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Atrocismus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his bodie must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the bodie onely: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis linea- 50 menta refert (saith S. AUGUSTINE), Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans bodie. Deus enim non est humana forme particeps, neque corpus humanum diuine (saith PHILO), God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which significeth a shadow, or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow; Let vs then know and consider, that God; who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the verie essence and Maiestie of God.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then these grosse Heretikes: Ad similitudinem Dei proprius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The vertue which is in man (saith he) came neerer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, inuisible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitie it selfe, and (in a word) Goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himselfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his vnexcogitable power and perfectnesse? certainly, not in dominion alone: for the Deuill is said to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, because man hath an immortall soule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Deuils are also immortall, and participate those faculties, being called Dæmones, because scitentes of Knowledge, and subtiltie; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of shamefull parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of S. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Iustice and Pietie: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and over the Beasts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude Reason, as it is the abilitie of Vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Trenus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale onely; but that he vnderstood it better, with SYBILLA: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens: Man, that is endued with right reason, is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse God his Creatour, and the same God to serue, loue, and obey: and therefore said Saint Angustine (who herein came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente, God made man, in respect of the intellectu, after his owne image and similitude; and REYNERIVS; Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei, Reyn. de mem. Man was made after the image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

BUt Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift 40 of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall strength of the minde, or soule, cuius actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus diuinus, intellectuall contemplatiue, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderstanding, and an intellectuall minde contemplatiue. Est autem mens nostra (saith CYRANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kinde 50 powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercvrius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that hee esteemeth it to be the verie essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (saith MERCVRIVS) est Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightened, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our soules the purest; and the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightened. And this Mens others call animam animæ, The soule of the soule, or with S. Angustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, que amor sapientiæ tanquam ducē sequitur, Which followeth after after the loue of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) betweene which and reason, betweene which and the mind, called anima, between which & that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which we iudge and discouref; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, viuificat; or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueh it life: for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the VVorld, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, perspicacem anime partem, the perceiving part of the mind, or the light by which the Soule discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur, & in furiosis mens extinguatur, anima manet, In ment that sleepe it is this (mens) or vnderstanding, and not the mind or soule, which resteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, & in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the soule: for mad men doe liue, though distracted.

Therefore this word being often vsed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted minde, in stead of a broken vnderstanding, which word (minde) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honest minde, or a man of a iust minde: sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mindes sake; and Aristotle sometimes vseth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without discouref: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is vsed in the proper signification, including both the vnderstanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderstand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to bee disieuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently MERCURIUS: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei, Deus menti preest, mens anima, anima corpus; The Soule (meaning that which giueh life) is the Image of this vnderstanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderstanding is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler over this vnderstanding, this vnderstanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the body. This diuision and distinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetikes, I leaue to the Reader to iudge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marfilus Ficinus in his ninth booke of the Soules immortallitie labourerth to proue. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (saith he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo, tanquam medio, per quod intelligat, quanquam eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat: hoc autem obiectum sunt phantasmata, seu verum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra adphantasium prolata: To exercise the facultie of vnderstanding, the mind of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderstand: but it needeth an object, whereon to looke, and whence to conceiue the act of vnderstanding. This object are the phantasies, or the resemblances of things receiued from the sense & carryed to the phantasie. But in effect his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the vnderstanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderstood to be an Organum of any thing; but of the vnderstanding. And he addeth that the resemblance of things in mans imaginatiō, are to his vnderstanding & mind, as colours are to the sight: whence it fo followeth, that the imagination or phantasie itself is to the facultie of vnderstanding, as the eye is to the facultie of seeing; & as this is an organum, so that. Of this question, How the minde in all her actions maketh vse of the body, & hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most graue & learned Discouref in the last Reply of M. D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, vnto Henry Jacob. How foucer the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discouref, nor in respect of the minde itselfe by which we liue, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which we are immortall, that wee are made after the Image of God. But most failely may we resemble our selues to God in mentis, and in respect of that pure facultie which is neuer separate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to bee after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed, intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint Augustine) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, vnderstandeth, and loueth it selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit: & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corrupti concupiscentie affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of God, but sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it vnprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as afore said) by reason of Immortallitie, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, wee are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteoufnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberalitie, that we were printed with the seale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioyned to the soule is a part of the Essentiall Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and contriued within the Trunke of Dust and Clay, the inimitable habilitie of his owne Pietie, and Righteoufnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office or Magistracie to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long re-
 tayne this Image, as they feare, loue and serue God truly, that is, for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruite and deface his Seale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obdurate finnes. For the vniust minde cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Iustice it selfe; The bloud-christie hath it not; for God is Chantice, and Mercie it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Satanas; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with God; and to be short, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, betweene beautie & deformity, or betweene righteoufnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receiue this Image of Gods goodnesse which the sensuall soules of beausts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and duple pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanhippe of Gods Wife, dome, and the liberalitie of his Mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impuritie of our flesh, behold the highest Heauens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during Glorie, and termelesse Ioy, prepared for those, which retaine the Image and similitude of their Creatour, preferring vndisled and vnrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteoufnes and Holinesse, as saith S. Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by Saint Augustine, with whom Saint Ambrose ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sinne doth not aboliish and take away these naturall gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Diuine Grace and heauenly Glorie, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

¶ III.

Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortal Soule.

THe externall man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam, of red Earth, or, ex limo terra, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex quibet humo, sed ex ghaipar adamath (id est) ex pinguisima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, for that am but dust and ashes: And in these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabite, according to Iob. And though our owne eyes doe euery where behold the sudden and relentless assaults of Death, and Nature assureth vs by neuer-failing Experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Andulles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Hiues of vnnumbred cares, sorrowes and passions: and that (when we are most gloried) we are but those painted posts, against which Enue and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that we only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortal Soule, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the cuer-living subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that wee examine this great account? Neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: wee plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches whiles our strength enableth vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that we must goe the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for vs in the darke; And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues,) we behold therein the fearefull Images of our actions past, and withall this terrible Inscription: That God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But what examples haue cuer moued vs? what perswasions reformed vs? or what threatnings made vs afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaied before vs, we heare what is promised and threatned: but the Worlds bright glorie hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights, (with which we only see) doe neither looke vp towards termelesse ioyes, nor downe towards endlesse sorrowes, till wee neither know, nor can looke for any thing else, at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Marium Victor:

Egerunt, sumus, qui nunc sumus, nifi periculi
Tentati, nibilo meliores reddimur unquam,
Sub vitis nullo culparum sine manentes.*

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in vs no change haue wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same fiare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sinne that hath no end.

But let vs not flatter our immortal Soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that wee neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that wee offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) cuen a contemptuous laughing to scorne, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Frustra sperant, quis de misericordia Dei sibi blandimur; They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercie.

¶ IV.

¶ IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcasse God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing Soule: (that is) God gaue a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spirituall and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortalitie into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith ELI in Iob) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me Life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs suis suspirasse in faciem formati, ut viuere possit & spiraculum vite habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tua fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: Immo hic sententia (saith he) the beggerline of carnall sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that he might liue, and haue the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands haue made me, spake thus Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi hijs, qui Scripturas sensu corpore legunt? In what danger are they that reade the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, que viuificat corpus, & animam, Which doth animate, and giue life to the bodie. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith Iob; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable Soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the bodie returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum, Lord Iesus, receiue my spirit: and in S. Iohn, And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue up the ghost, or spirit, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortal Soule of man differeth from the soules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence receiued life: so shall they againe be dissolued into the same first matter, when they were taken: but the life of breath euerslasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gaue it.

¶ V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom hee made the Iast, and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which hee might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose Image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, he vouchsafed vnto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper ratioll belonging vnto man, and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE) Homo est vtriusq; naturae vinculum, Atan is the bond and chaine which ieth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Dem igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, dum, in breui magnum, atq; exigno totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World, the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of Man, and therefore heauie and lumpish; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which OVID:

Inde genus durum sumus, experientisq; laborum, Et documenta damus, qua simul origine nati:

From thence our kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approouing, that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carryed by Brookes and Riueres ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moisture, Oyle, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heate feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitye of the Earth; the haire of mans bodie, which adorne or ouer-shaddowes it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering & vnstable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our cies, to the light of the Sun and Moone, and the beautie of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat dry vp, and wither away, or the fierce puffes of winde blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne image and similitude: And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for in Angels, deprehes facit iustitia, nichil, hee found folly in his Angels (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteous selfe. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homoc est mensura cuniarum rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee seeme onely to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein wee are taught and instructed, our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Loue, Delire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which wee seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we beginne to take account of our times, iudge of our felices, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seventh to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we find by deare and lamentable experience, & by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more wee are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made vnforcible to others, we become a burthen to our selues: being of no other life, then to hold the riches we haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on vnto, with many lighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which wee alwayes trauel both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honor & riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by a hat crooked path sooner we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose doores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Stream, but neuer floweth againe: our Lease once fullen, springeth no more, neither neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new Leaues and flowers.

Redditur arboribus flores reuercitibus etas, Ergo non homini, quod fuit ante, redit.

To which I giue this Ruse,

The Plants and Trees made poore and old	But neuer Man repayr'd againe
By Winter enuious,	His youth and beautie lost,
The Spring-time bounteous	Though Art, and care, and cost,
Couers againe from shame and cold:	Doe promise Natures helpe in vaine.

And of which,

CATVLLVS, EPIGRAM. 53.	Nobis cum semel occidit breuis lux,
Solus occidere & redere possunt:	Nox est perpetua una dormienda.
The Sunne may set and rise:	Sleepe after our short light
But we contrariwise	One euermlasting night.

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academicke, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the sap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preferred, doth euermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the first power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himselfe.

THESE be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrayned will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall Life; a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to bee his owne guide, his owne Workman, and his owne Painter, that hee might frame or describe vnto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACHES) and left him in the hands of his owne counsaile. Such was the liberalltie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change; and the small Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wiy) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensuall of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which soeuer he tooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should futuramente grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was anigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Airandula) in the person and fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was faigned, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutalltie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Cruelty, and from Iustice to Oppression. For by the liuely Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceiters; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, rauening, and greedie Men; which also S. Matthew resembleneth to false prophets, Which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolves: by the images of Stones and flockes, foolish and ignorant men; by Vipers, vngratefull men: of which S. Iohn Baptist, O yee generation of Vipers, &c.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more : and of the cause thereof, because the Finerall created was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the Creation ; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested : for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui volu-issest fecisse. Withwhom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the creatures therein to themselves : for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I worke, but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, (but as afore-said) gave vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselves ; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds : all which being finished, God saw that his works were good ; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were ; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gave to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberall choice, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the cruelty of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed : but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contained, referred by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken : and that it is no marvell that men should erre.

Oncerning the first Habitation of man we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages haue held dispute ; and the opinions and iudgements haue bene in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure : some there are, that haue conceiued the being of the terrestrial Paradise, withoutall regard of the Worlds Geographic, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and iudge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein hee was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, understood one place for another ; and one Error is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely retrayned. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselves to follow and imitate others, wherein all things so obseruant Sectatours of those Masters, whom they admired and beleueed in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, then to examine theirs.
For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magno errore (magnorum viro-rum auctoritate persuasi) transmissimus : Vix pisse ouer many grosse errors, by the authoritie of great men led and persuaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth : for they were men ; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakenesse.

Nulli

Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus, God neuer gaue the knowledge of all things to any one. S. Paul counteth that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh ; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day ; and therefore, seeing knowledges infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi inuenitur ? (saith Iob) Iude 9. v. 27.
but where is wisdom found ? and where is the place of vnderstanding ? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the liuing. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabit in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings : and so the Fathers, and other learned men excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

Now touching Paradise, first it is to be inquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no : or whether Moses description were altogether mysticall, & allegoricall, as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of those foure Riues, Pison, Gehon, Hidekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations ; as, that by the foure Riues were meant the foure Cardinale vertues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Honny. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Franciscus Georgius receiued (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose frivollous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his first Booke. fol. 338. the last Edition.
S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third Heauen, and in the vertues of the mind, & in nostro principali, which is, as I con-ceiue it, in mente, or in our soules : to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort.
By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or mind ; by Adam, Mens, or Vnderstanding ; by Eue, the Sense ; by the Serpent, Delectation ; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience ; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinth. cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestiall and terrestrial Paradise ; the one, into which S. Paul was rapt ; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus was of opinion, that a Paradise had bene, but that there was now any marke thereof on the earth : the same being not only defaced, but with-all the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth ; to which opinion Vadianus inclineth, as I conceiue his words in two severall places. First, vpon this : Fill the earth, GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (vs tunc erat) fructibus constam, sedem & hortum illum Adæ, & posteritatis futuram fuisse. These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruite and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdne it and rule ouer every creature, doe cleerely shew, that the Finerall earth (as it is called) filled with all sorts of fruite (as then it was) was the garden and seat of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he re-acknowledgeth the place, out of the ACT the 17. Apostolus ex vno sanguine omne genus humanum adu factum docet, ut habitarem super cinerem scilicet terræ : tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat. The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth : and therefore all the earth (saith hee) was that Paradise. Which conceits I will answer in order. Coropius Becanus di-recteth not much from this opinion ; but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden ; which place Coropius findeth neere the Riuer of Acemes, in the confines of India.

Terrallian, Bonanumare, and Durandus, make Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall, and Possellus, quite contrarie, vnder the North pole : the Chaldaean also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it seated out of this sensible word, or raysed into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Raba-

Rabanus, were both sicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Iudens, that he wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus; By what euill Angel he was blowne up into this error: so can I not but greatly maruaile at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wanded; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, doe so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riuer which watered it, and by the points of the Compass vpon which it lay, in respect of Iudea, or Canaan.

Nonimagus also, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleueth that all the earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beautie adscribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountaine, from whence the foure Riuer, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riuer of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Aegypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

Gen. 2. 8.

O the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And howeuer the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauerat Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the seuerall Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, & for a Nouue appellation; which Region, in respect of the fertilitye of the soile, of the many beautifull Riuer, and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe all waies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantnesse or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie, opposit to the Ile of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrie, so called for the flourishing beautie thereof, so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacie, for the pleasure, or delicacie: and as Florida signifieth flourishing: so Eden signifieth pleasure, & yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seate of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Sequentie; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodore, Gregories and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Senerius, Damasceus &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damasceus owne words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter confusus; Paradise is a place, maruailously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilbelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both vnderstand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisienfis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words: After this I will begin so speake of Paradise terrestriall, vpon which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hec incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Mors enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo confusum in regione terra Orientalis, qua dicitur Haden: Haden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legitur Cuius habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Haden; For Moses (saith (saith he) dath shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Haden: but that Haden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we read, that Cuius habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Haden. Perez Peri, Peri, Peri, endeouoreth to qualifie this translation: for this particel (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleging this place of Christ that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whercon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) aduiseh himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, Cuius habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Haden, Collocatus Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Post à parte Orientali horti Eden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Eden, Cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, onely to the end, to find Paradise vpon the Riuer of Aceffus: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good, and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying towards the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sunne riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damasceus): affirming, that we all waies pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned them selues in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwayes towards the West, thereby to auoid the superstition of the Aegyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudea, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, for our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell west from Paradise, and pray turning our selues towards the East, may remember thereby, to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we haue lost the Paradise on Earth: so by *Christ*s death and passion wee may be made partakers of the Paradise celestiall, & the Kingdom of Heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other myserie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden; in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Iudea and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and Persia: of which Ouid:

The East wind with Aurora hath abiding Among th' Arabians, and the Persian Hills, Whom Phaebus first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremie the Prophet threatening the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Armye was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Pet. Comestor giueth best satisfaction: for he vseth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est (saith he) à prima orbis parte, and afterward he affirmeth, that (à principio, and ad Orientem) haue the same signification; From the beginning & Eastward is all one, à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the prooffe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegorically followed in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Vers. in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow euery Tree pleasant to the sight, & good for meate, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, & then, put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dress it & keepe

Vcrse 18. keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestiall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer, exprelling also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrey neere vnto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

Exch. 31. 9. But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Ev a arbore, non est Ad am, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias reuocantur: If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fontaine, and then no Riuer, if no Riuer, then no such foure heads or branches, and then not any such Riuer as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such Fig-tree, or fruit, or leaues, Ev then did not eate of the fruit, neither was there any Ad am, or any man, the truth was but a Fable, and all things esteemed are called backe into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon Daniel: Conticebant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur euertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores potent Allegoria legibus se debere subnere, Let the doctrine of them be silent, who following shadows and Images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Riuers and the Trees vnder the rules of Allegories.

Gen. 3. 3.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gaue Adam free libertie to eate of euery Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eate; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmaticall or Mysticall, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings vseth this speech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him, which proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to be terrestiall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulities of future ages, whom he knew (one of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Riuers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbelleeuing Israelites and others after them, would haue misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would haue beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had beene an Propia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnaturall sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar; In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proueth plainly, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beautie and fertilitie, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a feast and ioye of farre exceeding excellencie.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous Gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their prayes of the Elysian fields, but out of the Storie of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ouid:

Ouid. Metam. 1.

Ver erat aeternum, placidiq; repensibus auris Mullebant Zephyri muros sine femine flores.

The ioyfull spring did euer last, | Sweete flowers by his gentle blast
And Zephyrus did breede | Without the helpe of seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Secta.

Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poeticall conuersions, as if they had bin conceiued out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the Riuer that ran out of it, and that the same after wards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hauila and Cush, & that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Deserts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote, I then conceiue, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for aswell in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententia: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligunt: alia eorum, qui spiritaliter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui vtroq; modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it altogether corporall: a second of those which conceiue it altogether spirittuall, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: Quemadmodum homo (sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nemus, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est praeditum, (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradise.

But it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proued, the same is also made more apparent. For if wee should conceiue that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to haue come into India, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous then the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enuieheth Egypt, and these two Riuers so farre distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these freames can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Sauour, were said to haue beene in some such Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowing: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would haue taken but a slender roote in the mindes of men: for times and places are approoved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or giue place to the iudgement of some Writers vpon this place of Genesis (though other wise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour & reuerence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleue that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe & separated, as to hang in the Ayre vnder the circle of the Moone? or who so doltish to conceiue, that from thence the foure riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall downe, and run vnder all the Ocean, & rise vp againe in this our habitable world, & in those places where they are now found? Which left any man think, that I enforce or straine to the worst, these are Peter Comestors own words. Est aut locus amoenissimus, longo terra & mari tractu a nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adu elenatus, ut visq; ad lunare globu attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, seuered from our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, eleuated so, that it reacheth to the Globe of the Moone.

ut illinc per precipitum delabantur flumini tanto cum impetu, quantum verbiis exprimere non possumus; eorum impetu impulsis precipitiis, sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus pressantibus ebulant, in hoc a nobis cultio obest: which haue this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we giue this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region sure raised about this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Riues fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried vnder the deepe Ocean, and doe againe rise and boyle vp in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totius terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Luna orbis Lunæ cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions do not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Naele of this our World, and (as Melancthon saies) in parte terre meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre, the Vniuersal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, & of the worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood, into all other remote regions & countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, & out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streames & branches of Mankind haue followed & bin deduced. If then it doe appere by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine seuerall opinions before remembered, by the Truth it selfe; & to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no map can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for mine owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot denie, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beauty: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had been no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 350. yeares after the Flood, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the verie Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Riues still remaine the same Riues. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay; & learning out one of these Riues, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a Riuer to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision & branching of those riues must be in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the riues run as they doe, North & South) & therefore these riues yet remaining, & Eden manifestly knowne, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages know it not, so is there no probability, that cyther these Riues were turned out of their courses, or new Riues created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deepe Vallies. For what descent of waters could there be in a Sphericall and round bodie, wherein there is not high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is cyther by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flood of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are moit enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a wind to passe vpon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, vntill the waters stank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the wind to blow, to drye vp the abundant slime and mudd of the Earth, and make the Land more firme, and to cleanse the Ayre of thicke vapours, and vnholsome mists; and thus we know by experience, that all downe-right raines doe euermore disseue the violence of outrageous windes, and beat downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one height ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulles to receiue a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, then that they moued with any ragging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Joseph auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his daies, which Pillars were set vp about 1426. yeares before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred yeares old at the creation of them; and Joseph himselfe, to haue liued some fortie or fiftie yeares after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleue all that he wrote, yet that, which hee auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) bee called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such Pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Genesis (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch, built by Cain, about the Mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Amnius (who commented vpon that inuented fragment) saith, were to be seene in his daies, who liued in the Reigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile; and if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent. For, speaking of this Citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regions, Cruisus Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in these things) that the Citie of Ioppa was built before the Flood, ouer which Cepha was King: whose name with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine Altars of Stone; and it is not vnpossible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Amnius, might be seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first City of the world, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it.

Gen. 2. 1.

And to proue directly, that the flood was not the cause of Mountaines, but that there were Mountaines from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood enuoyed by fiftene Cubits the highest Mountaines. And Masius Damasceus (speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Et supra Minyadam excelsum mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo configientes multos sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos; And vpon Minyada there is an high Mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselves thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saued then eight persons (which Masius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountaines were before the Flood, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; & on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntuly, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Flood: on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saued themselves also; but (as Amnius saith) without all authoritie, either Diuine or Humane.

Lastly,

Gen. 1. 11.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turne vpside-downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this that when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive-leaf in her mouth, which she had pluckt, and which (vntill the Trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them floating on the water; a manifest proofe, that the Trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written: folium Olive, raptum or decerptum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to reare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to reach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouerie.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to be the fountaine of these foure Riuer.

Gen. 1. 8.
Acts 17. 26.

Gen. 1. 8.

§. 1. 1.

His conceit of Aug. Chrysostomus being answered, who onely giueth his opinion for reason, I wil in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Neoumagus, of Adrianus, of Coropius Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Adrianus allegeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule ouer euery Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one bloud all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which hee was Lord and Gouernor, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of bloud originally; and Adams Posteritie inhabited in proceffe of time ouer all the face of the Earth, yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and culiue, in which hee liued in blessed estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choice, but that Adam had bin left to the vniuersall; Moses would not then haue said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West, but respectiue. And to what end had the Angell of God bene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the vniuersall had bene Paradise? for then must Adam haue bene chased also out of the World. For if all the Earth were Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction then this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleue with Metastodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to denie, he thinks all one, as to asserme, That in so large a field, as the vniuersall, there should grow but one Thistle. NOVIOMAGVS vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Riuer, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so farre distant) to rise out of one fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those foure Riuer, being so vnderstood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Pisou was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsely for Nilus, although Ganges be a Riuer by Hamilah in India, and Nilus run through Aethiopia. The Seuentic write Chus for Aethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Neoumagus, Coropius, and Adrianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture farre more probable, then that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated farre beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Caluary in Hiernusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeares after the Flood, yet Adams thin-bones must haue containd a thousand sadome, and much more, if he had forded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disproue it.

Of their opinion, which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the Ayre.

Hardly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoole-men asserme, Paradise to be a place, altogether removed from the knowledge of men (locus a cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceiued, that Paradise was in the East, but mounted aboue the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Perrinus layes it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus: and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neereft heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neyther of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for Heauen it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Arcopagites (in this and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleueed in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Demill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr assermeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothonos) which being aboue all Clouds of Raine, or other inconuenience, the people (by reason of their so many yeares) are called Macrobi (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is vsed, for proofe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard; in which place also Tertullian conceiued, that the blessed Soules were preserved till the last iudgement; which Irenaeus, and Iustine Martyr also beleueed. But this opinion was of all Catholicke Diuines reprobued, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement: Sicut certum est. Enoch et Eliam nunc viuere: ita ubi nunc sunt: an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that Enoch and Elias doe now liue: so where they now liue, in Paradise or elsewhere, it is vncertaine. But Barcephas giues a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Riuer (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not haue had sufficient force to haue thrust themselves vnder the great Ocean, and afterward haue forced their passage through the earth, and haue risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreames haue bene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Perrinus, writing vpon this subiect: of whose arguments I will repeat these few: for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be iudged a vanitie in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is first therefore alleaged, that such a place cannot be commodious to liue in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had bene too neere the Sunne, and other heauenly bodies. Secondly, because it must haue bene too ioynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the ayre in that Region is so violently moued, and carried about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betweene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptoleme and Aristagoras) is seuentene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes a grosse account about one hundred and twentie thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must haue the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it bin so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions Tositatus addeth, that those people which dwell nere those falls of waters, are deafe from their infancy, like those which dwell nere the Citadape, or ouer-falls of Nilus. But thus I hold as fained. For I haue scene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling nere them, are not deafe at all. Tositatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrose together to which Pererius, Sed ego hac apud Basilienſe & Ambrosiū in eorū scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquā me legere memini; But I doe not remember (saith he) that I euer read those things, either in Basil or Ambrose.

But for the bodies of Enoch & Eliu, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking vp might be into the celestially Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heauen, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed, in Enoch & Eliu, was eatie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the flood all perished on the earth, sauing eight persons, and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be.

Gen. 7. 19.

Exod. 14. 21.

For Tositatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleued that Paradise was raised about the middle Region of the Aire, and twentie cubits above all Mountaines, that the flood did not therfore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouer-whelme it:) this is also contrarie to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction reacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flooded all the mountaines vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Malus, Damasenus, & the Thalmadists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saved themselves on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Iordan; and as the flood was not naturall, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleued, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacie and beaurie so resembled. But thus I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better reach all their Followers to shift, then to resolve, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tositatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Synagor, Seth, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both Springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the alhes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence waish off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolved vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinie himselfe, who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountaines is far vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thinne (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

THose which come neerer vnto Reason, finde Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus: iudging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas obiectioneth the distemperate heate, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa), for although Paradise could not bee vnder the Line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas

it appeared, that euerie Countrey, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Æquinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heat: It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countreies which were situated directly vnder it, were of a distemper vnhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those daies it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beaurie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vnhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the line it selfe. For hercof experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discerned. Indeed it hath so pleased God to prouide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a fure off, are found by triall and the witnesse of mens traualles, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitlesse lump to fallion out the rest. For God himselfe (saith Isay) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated vnder the Æquinoctiall line, or neerest it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Eastlandly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sun cannot so much matter it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equall, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places, which my selfe haue seen, neere the Line & vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions haue so many goodly Riuers, Fontaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, euer bearing, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit both Greene and ripe, as it may of all other places be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branchs are neuer vncliothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not vnder ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered Husband Vernantius, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countreies called Terræ vitiosæ, Vicious Countreies: for Nature being liberall to all without labour, necessitie impoling no industrie or trauell, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoolemen were grosse in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places, and that besides that Eden in Calefrya, there is a Countrey in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esay. 37. and Ezechiel. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor vnder Terridæ Zonas; it followeth that now we discover and finde out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names, with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we finde that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subiect and intralld.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petraea, but in this region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not bee Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuer, as are exprest to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must bee Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertility, & the riuer only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by RABSAKES: Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, & RESFIDIM, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to auoid confusion, we must vnderstand that there were 2. Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapollitan: the second part is that Valley called Auenis, otherwife Conuallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Affyria is ioyned to Arabia the Desert, & where Ptolemy placeth the City of Aueria: & the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenu, or Calcfyria, otherwife Pallus cana, or the hollow Valley, because the mountaines of Tibanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cocle in Greeke is Cana in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lye East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknewne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleueed this Calcfyria to be the lme which Moses describeth. For the time cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beza, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise, though to giue Beza his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other latter Writers, saying, That hee sayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether misvnderstood two of the four riuers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Desart, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith ESAYAH) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath euer bene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Amederane Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issius, now Liazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euery Countrey yielded: and hauing counted the fuerall People and Countries, he addeeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silke, and of broydered workes, fine linnen, corall, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba & Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faïres, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yeeld: & because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countries yielded; and and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plentie of gold. The better to conuey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Terradon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited farre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneh, Selenia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into fower heads, and which tooke that name from Selenus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hierosolymitanus thinkes it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I mean on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite vpon Euphrates, where the fame beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenite) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the bankes of Euphrates, as far as the Citie of Thapsacus, where Ptolemy appointed the Pords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleucia & Babylonis euntibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which trauele fro Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, doe much mistake it. For Clarran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, & Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluuius, the Greeke word (Mesopotamia) importing, a Country between riuers: for At for in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos fluuius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the Citie it selfe, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid). For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that tract of Land from the borders of Calcfyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, & were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part of the Desart, stretching themselves toward the vnhabited Solitude of Palmirena. which lyeth betweene Syria, and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Selenia for Selenia was anciently called Chalanne (witnesseth Appian); and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Selenia, and almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Selenia, and the other opposite vnto it, where these riuers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to ioine. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is vncertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine seat thereof, that so many other Cities did retaine a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betwene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or betweene Canne the old, and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinarie in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other Citie ioyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the 14.1. Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq[ue] reuerterentur, perueniunt ad Charan, quæ sita medio itinere contra Niniven, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charan, (which is the mid-way against Ninive) the eleventh day.

14.7.1. This Citie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charan (speaking to the high Priest:) Te Men, brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charan. But the seat of this Citie is not doubted of: for it is not onely remembered in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and ouerthrow of Craſſus the Romane, who for his insatiable greediness was called Gurgis auaritia; The gulf of auarice. Whereof Lucan:

With Roman blood th' Aſſyrian Carre he defil'd.

6.10.10. But this Citie Came or Chalæ is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written of Nimrod: And the beginning of his Kingdomes was Babel, & Erech, & Acad, & Chalæ, in the land of Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar or neere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldea, Babylonia, Shinar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR). Three names of one Countrey: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Towre Babel; & the Towre, of the confusion of tongues. 20 And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proued in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Playne Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Cameh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatnes, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Cameh ioyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel completh with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrians: and Eſay in the threats of Senacherib against Iherusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telaſſar. But be- 30 fore I conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessarie to describe, those other Countreies, which Ezechiel ioyneth therewith in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Morouer the ſonnes of HAM were CUSH, &c. And the ſonnes of CUSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, and RAAMAH, &c. And the ſonnes of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after, CUSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceiue to the contrarie, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward 40 the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterward Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faires with the cheefe of all pices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrey, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix; and which ioyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrey Strabo calleth

Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people haue an interchange trade with Elana, lying on the East side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue beene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, pices, and precious stones: of which they had not onely plenty of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOſTHENES: In Persia ora initio Insula est, in qua multis & pretiosissimones gignuntur: in alijs vero, clari & perclucidi lapilli. ERATOſTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred: and in other, verie cleare and shining stones. Now, the difference betweene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech); and Sheba with (Schin); but but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthographie, their Countreies and Habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea; and for that place of the 72. Psalm: expounded, Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Shebe & Sabe.

The Shebeans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same Riuer, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and vpon it, paſt vp the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charan, and Cameh, border Eden on the West and Northwest: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east. Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphraſt, which Countrey by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often vs.

Thus much of those Countreies which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the cheife were the Edenites, inhabiting Telaſſar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telaſſar lay most convenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyris. Now to make these things the more plaine, we must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly diſioyned.

For it appeareth both in Eſay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabſache, the while the Armie of Aſſyria lay before Iherusalem, that the Cities of Cosan, Naran, Reſeph, and the Edenites at Telaſſar, had resisted the Aſſyrians, though by them (in a fort) mastered and recovered. Hane the gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue destroyed, as Golan, and Naran, Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Eſar-Haddon held Aſſyria, and Mesodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Armie of Se- 2. Kings 19. 35.

nacherib, commanded by Rabſache which lay before Iherusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed: the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recouerie of his health, and his victory obtained ouer the Aſſyrians. After which ouerthrow, Senacherib himselfe was slain by his owne sonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Eſar-Haddon succeeding him in Aſſyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Mesodach, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which inuited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subuerſion. So as, the suspicion of warre encreasing betwene Babylon and Aſſyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Aſſyria, were employed to beare off the incursions of the 40 Aſſyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telaſſar: and the very word (Telaſſar) (saith Iunius, signifying as much, as a Bulwarke against the Aſſyrians. This place Herodotus takes for Reſem, others for Selenia: but this Telaſſar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the Historie of Iulian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Persia) calleth Tiblis in stead of Telaſſar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Booke: It is seated in an Island of Euphrates vpon a steepe and vnassailable 50 Rocke, in so much as the Emperour Iulian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Aſſyrians, being also a passage out of Meſopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Tamies of the Countrey adioyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Protonius calleth Teridata, hauing Reſeph (which he calleth Reſepha) on the left hand, and Cameh, (which he calleth Thelæ-Came) on the right hand, not farre from whence is also found the Citie of Mann-came vpon Tigris, and all these seated together, as Eſay and Ezechiel haue sorted them. But the vnderstanding of these places is the more difficult, because Aſſyria (which the Chaldeans call Aturia) and Meſopotamia, were so often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Aſſyria & Meſopotamia in Babylonia nomen tranſierunt (saith NIGER.) Aſſyria and Meſopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adiacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, seated, as, by Charran or Hararin in Mesopotamia: also by Canneh and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translatheth this place: Plantauerat autem Iehouah Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is: (saith he in his Annotations.) Iussit nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiae & Mesopotamiae, He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia, which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes wee may haue some farther light for the prooffe of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminence.) It hath (saith hee) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day, though in the rest of the Region fo called this name be swallowed vp, with the fame of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath vp the River, and not farre beyond it, the Citie of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Feris Petra: below it, it hath Mosul or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Masius) it is not above twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mosul or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembered among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in these words. Iuxta autem Tigrim. Ciuitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quae nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta neere vnto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimonie of Masius informed by the Christians that dwell therein (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mosel (or Mosal) is in the Confinnes of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated vpon Tigris, and in the neighbor-hood of Niniue; and that it is the famous Selencia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Ninive; Of all the Cities & Townes which are about the Citie of Mosal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Ninive. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change S into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not farre off Selencia) for Selencia, so be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosal, and that ancient Citie, which Ptolomie and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures, Niniue, Philophrastus, and Simeon Sethi, Mosula, and John Lean Mosal, others Mosel, (thought hee not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher vpon the same River of Tigris, neere Mosal: so that we are like to find this Ile of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it about Mosal, makes it to be below Hafan-Cepha, which is vpon the same River of Tigris.

The onely difficultie is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnprobable. And yet if this were the meaning heere, we haue a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath bin subiect to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world haue bene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after after the flood called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris, betwene Mount Taurus, and Selencia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Ethiopic maketh mention, (not that latter Ethiopic, Disciple of Callinicus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenius called Isfri, who lived in Aegypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of Greeke by Saint Ierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Ethiopic, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a River of Phoenicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the Region named by Ethiopic. For Ethiopic makes it a Countrey, and not a River, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of Chus Ethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions, (saith Ethiopic) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which River he calleth Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traueise Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitye. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitye thereof in diuers places, is not vnworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaues are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetuall Spring.

Also STEPHANVS de urbibus mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Calisyria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discouery, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Persis were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Sciente and all others conuert Perath by Euphrates & Hiddekel Tigris omnes exponunt: & alimen vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Vatable.) And because that which I haue said of the Ile of Eden, shall not be subiect to the censure of selfe-inuention, I haue heere-vnder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as MASIVS (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, & haue to this day (at least in Queene MARIUS time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie called Selencia Parthorum, or Mosel vpon the River of Tigris; hauing no sufficient authority to choosethemselues a Patriarch (which cannot bee done without foure or three Metropolitan Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an Election as themselues had made: hauing three hundred years before that vpon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a couetous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselues together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had bene of one House and Family to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Vpon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselues. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle: Perum nos non acceptauimus nec, proclamauimus ipsum, sed subito conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Ninive, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Insula quae est in medio Tigri, fluminis Edenae, ex Tauris Persia, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selues out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Ninive, & out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella, and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Ti- gris, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they vse these words: Neg. super sunt apud nos Metropoles, quarum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli panti Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasius, Episcopus Adarbegan, en vestigio conuenimus in Insulam, que est intra Tigridis flumen, Eden, secumque compachum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among vs any Metropolitans Bishops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmasius, and the Bishop of Adarbegan: but so, we assembled speedily in the land Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betwene our selues, &c.

Now this land of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better vnderstood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Iacobites, Maronites, and Coptis, he goeth on in these words: Mox audita illius morte, concurrere acbant tumultuario in itam quam modo dixi Tigris Insulam, que duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Metopolim, decem fere milia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undique cincta, & a paucis alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that land of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which land is situated about twelue miles above Mosul, containing very nere ten miles in compasse, and euery where it is one with a wall, inhabited by a few other men then Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: sue Geserta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Mosan-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra predictam Tigris Insulam rupi aspera impostam; Aboue the asore said land of Tigris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this land of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la riuire du Tigre, & perse que cest une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie, Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden lieth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Cameth, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edemites in Thelsassar were garriſond to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as aboue written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Enphrates, two of the knowne Riuer of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. X I.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuer to rise from one streame.

But it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Riuer, in the plural, which scruple Atarthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: Et flumens egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, quinde diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Que verba melius consentiunt cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et flumens erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) flumy procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium, & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was diuided into foure heads: which words (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Riuer went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard, and from thence it was diuided, and they became foure heads. The Tigrine differs from the Vulgar or Latine, for it conuers it thus: Et flumens egrediebatur de delicijs, And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et flumens egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was diuided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.

And for the word (Riuer) for Riuer, it is vsual among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that seedeth Seed, the fruitfull Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and againe, We eate of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees): And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God, in medio ligni Paradisi, in the middle of the Tree of the Garden, for (Trees): And of this opinion is David Kimhi, and 10 Vatablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum, and hee giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A Riuer (for Riuer) went out of Eden.

Gen. 1. 11.

And this answer out of diuers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, bee giuen to the obiection, That Moses speaketh but of one Riuer, from which the heads should diuide themselves. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the foure heads, to bee foure notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (Riuer) Verse the tenth for one Riuer (to wit) Enphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuer, (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue bin, diuides it selfe, & ere long yeldeth foure notable passages into seuerall Countries, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuer downward, there is conueneance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuer of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or waltheth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had vsed this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar melcha, (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigrid vnder Apamia, whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigrid, (as it were) Piso-tigrid. This leadeth to the Land of Hanila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabarsares or Narrages, for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie 30 flumen derivatum (a Riuer deriued,) also Acracanus, quasi Ranofus, by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper stream of Pison, or Basilus, which runneth into Hiddekel properly so called (that is, into Tigrid) about Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage vp Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigrid, having before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Enphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the bodie of the Riuer Enphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But, be it a Riuer, or Riuer, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigrid and Enphrates are noted in the Text, there can bee no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Riuer: for that Perath is Enphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigrid. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastwards towards Assur, as we find, that Tigrid is the Riuer of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chiefe Citie was Ninive, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Ninive, which was the chiefe Citie of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here vsed in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuer be (properly) their Fountaines, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aquae (saith 50 Vlstanus) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascitur, fons, si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountaine, then is the Fountaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuer any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new banks, there is that part of the Riuer, where the branch forsaiketh the maine streame, called the head of the Riuer.

§. XII.

¶ XII.

Of the strange fertilitye and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

Tmay also bee demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs described, bee of such fertilitye and beautie, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that remained that fertilitye and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Edenis but twelve miles or thereabout from Ninus, and so from Atlat. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Ninus sita erat. Haec regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue scene, is most excellent; and he addeth afterward: Cereus autem singulis procerando ad octo sexages, ut nunquam non fere ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corne, that it yeldeth two hundred fold. The leaues of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are euen in length like vnto Trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrey of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrey Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Tree Trees. Thus saith Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conueniunt; Of which the people make Brad, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Anonius the Eremit findeth a fifth commodity, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kind of fine Flaxe, of which people make their Garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Anonius the Eremit, confesseth, saying: That he received a Garment made thereof from the Eremit himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) passim per omnem Regionem Palme singulæ nascuntur; There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus a parte lanae Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam ubere & pingui solo, ut a pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (saith Strabo) for plentie of sweet Odours) there lieth a Champaigne Countrey placed betwixt Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a soile, that they are said to drine their Cattel from pasture, lest they should perish by satietie. Bis in anno fecetes Babyloni fecant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a year (saith Niger). And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, then in the Northerne parts: so we may iudge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be these in the Latine: Totam enim hac regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemq; semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, & Trees alwayes greene: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life & stirrer vp of Nature in a perpetual actiuite. In briefe, so great is the fertilitye of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to eate them vp with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fortie yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare Seed, but it grew vp as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith (saith Plinie) who addeth this singularitye to that soile, That the second yeere the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the feedes againe) yeldeth them a Haruest of Corne without any further labour: his words are these: Perbiat tanta sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restituta fiat seges.

¶ XIII.

Of the Riuer Pison, and the Land of Hauilah.

After the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitye thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Riuers should trouble so many wise men it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both, be that Riuer or Riuers of Eden, which water Paradis, which Riuer or Riuers Moses witnesseth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, then when we finde both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Riuers as farre distant, as any of fame knowne or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Riuers were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witness.

There is no error, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to bee singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weak babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the Riuer of Pison) seemeth to haue growne out of the not-diltinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Suliana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris tooke name from Hauilah the sonne of Cush, and Hauilah in India, from Hauilah the sonne of Ishlan, the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradis the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sonnes after the flood. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Hauilah, Sabab, and Ramab, and the sonnes of Ishlan were Ophir, and Hauilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Ishlan, that land of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and famous Riuer of the East India, and Hauilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which Riuer is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure Riuers, named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous Riuer after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this Riuer to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another Riuer, whom in this side India, for beautie, for neerenesse, & for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus cometh betwixt it, and Tigris? and betwixt Tigris and Indus is all that huge Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, further towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India in ira Gangem, which lie betwixt those two proud Riuers of Indus and Ganges; not called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is remoued from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges; which falleth into the Ocean, lieth lesse then fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoever readeth the Storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no Riuer in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspes was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to bee swallowed vp therein: Hydaspes (as afore said) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great great as it, having besides this, the Riuer of Coas, of Snaflus, Acefines, Adriu (otherwife Hirois, Hifpalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed vp with all their Children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one stream, it croffeth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia vifiteth the Ocean Sea.

But becaufe Pifon, which compaffeth Hauilah, as alfo Gehon, which watereth Cufh, muft fome where be ioyned with the reft in one bodie, or at leaft be found to proceede out of the fame Countrie of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede, out of doubt they cannot eyther the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus rifeth in the vtermoft of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the Riuer Ganges rifeth out of the Mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Caucafus, which diuides the Northerne Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddckel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the fame Armenia, by the Gordiean Mountaines, fo as Ganges, who onely trauielleth in her owne India, and Nilus through Aethiopia and Aegypt, neuer faw the land of Eden, or ioyned themfelves in one channell, either with themfelves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Mofes.

Therefore the Riuer Pifon, which enricheth Hauilah, is the fame which by ioyning it felfe with Tigris, was therefore called Pifis-tigris, or Pifo-tigris, of Pifon and Tigris, which Riuer watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the Sonne of Cufh gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, fo called of Hauilah the Sonne of Iofan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Hauilah of the Cufhites had alfo Gold, Bddellium, and the Onyx Stone. This Bddellium is a Tree, of the bignefle of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeldeth a certaine gum fweet to fmel to, but bitter in tafte, called alfo Bddellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bddellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew fignifieth Pearle: fo doth Engubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Hauilah or Sufiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrie of Sufiana or Hauilah stretcheth it felfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as farre as the Perfian Gulfe, on the East fide thereof: from which East fide had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo alfo wittnefleth, as was fhewed before.

The Greekes had a conceit, that Pifon was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (fayth Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, tranflateth Pifon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the fame impoffibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellefpon and all Asia the leffe, betwene it and Tigris. Now Pifon, which runneth through Hauilah or Sufiana, doth to this day retainne fome figne of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioyned and compounded name, and are called Pifo-tigris. And it is ftrange vnto me, that from fo great antiquitie there fhould be found remaining any refembling found of the firft name: for Babylon it felfe, which dwelleth fo neere thefe Riuer, is by fome writers knowne by the name of Bandas, as by Poitellus, by Cafaldus, of Baldach: by Baris, of Bagdad; and of Bongbedor, by Andrew Theuet; and yett all thofe that haue lately fene it, call it Bagdet. To this Riuer of Pifon, Ptoleme indeede with many others giue the name of Basilius or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mahar-fares and Marfaw, and Barfares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and Fontaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Iunius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profution, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrewes Parath, (fayth Ar. Montanus;) Pagninus, Perath; Iofephus, Phorah; Eufebius, Zozimus: Amnianus, Chalymicus: Gifilanus, and Colutinus terme it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affryans know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The fame confufion of names hath Tigris, as Diglio, and Diglah, Scilax, and Sol-lax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddckel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Genefis conceiueth rightly of thefe Riuer: for Euphrates and Tigris (fayth he) ftreame into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other other two are called Pifon and Gehon. The reason, why thefe two riuer ioyned in one (below Apamia) lofe their names, and are called Pifis-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguiſhed, is, becaufe the belt part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, linketh into the Lakes of Chaldea not farre from Vr, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Perfian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pifon doth.

This error that Pifon was Ganges, was firft broched by Iofephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weedes) and other men (who take his authoritie to be fufficient in matter of defcription, whereupon depended no other important conſequence (were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Anguſtine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pifon was tranſported into the Eaſt India, to find out Hauilah: fo was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compaffe Aethiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Mofes ſpeaketh in the deſcription of Paradiſe, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one ſide, and Cuſh (which is falſly interpreted Aethiopia) faſtened to it on the other ſide, wee ſhall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impoſe vpon men the tranſportation of Riuer, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vſes) were made to tranſport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cuſh the Sonne of Ham firſt ſate downe with his ſonnes Shebah, Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the ſonne of Cuſh, did that Region take name, which Pifon compalleth; and the land (called Cuſh) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cuſh himſelfe. For as the ſonnes of Iofan, Ophir and Hauilah, ſeated themſelves as neere together as they could in India, ſo did the ſonnes of Cuſh in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chauilah was firſt Chufa of Cuſh, then Chufa, Sufa, and Sufiana.

From this Hauilah vnto the Deſerts of Sur, did the Iſraelites and Amalechites poſſeſſe all the interiect Countries: for Saul ſmote the Amalechites from Hauilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphraſt conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the Red Sea, to Hauilah in the Eaſt India, for Saul was no ſuch traualier or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah muſt be found neerer home, where the ſonnes of Iſmael inhabited, and which countrie Saul waſted: for Amalec & the Amalechites poſſeſt that necke of Countrie, betwene the Perfian Sea, and the Red Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towards the Eaſt, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the Weſt, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South and they ſped themſelves with the Midianites and Edumians, from the Eaſt part, or backe ſide of the Holie Land, to the banks of Euphrates, compriſing the belt part of Arabia Petraea and Deſerta.

¶ XIII.

Of the Riuer Gehon and the Land of Cuſh: and of the ill tranſlating of the Aethiopia for Cuſh, 2. C. HIRON. 21. 16.

Now, as Hauilah in the Eaſt India drew Pifon fo farre out of his way thither, ſo I ſay did Cuſh (being by the Senenite tranſlated Aethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cuſh being taken for Aethiopia by the Greekes whom the Latines followed, Gehon conſequently was eſteemed for Nilus. But Aethiopians are, as much, as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countreie is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Aegypt. And although there be many other Regions of Aethiopians, and farre South in Africa, yet thoſe of Thebaides are thoſe ſo often remembred in the Aegyptian ſtores, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Aegypt: all which Aethiopians are very neere, or liſe directly vnder the Equinoctiall line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chufites; who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any ſort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this tranſlation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (ſayth he) two Aethiopia's, the Eaſt, and the Weſt: and this diſtinction he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now becauſe there is no colour to make Chus Aethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chufh and the land of the Chufites (which is Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to bee the Eaſt Aethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Cuſh and the land of the Chufites, be that tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitauit Iſmael ab Hauilah uſq; Sur, quae reſpicit Gen. 25. 18.

Ægyptus introcutibus Affyrijs; ISMAEL dwelt from Hamilah unto Sur, that is, towards Ægypt, as thou goest toward Affyria; The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of scripture, Habitant ISMAEL, &c. hath this sense: *Ismael dwelt from Hamilah, which is the way of Affyria, or the Countrey bordering Affyria; and Sur, which lieth toward Ægypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhibited all those Regions betwene the border of Ægypt and Affyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharaniba, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; for that had bene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing lo mightie a King as the King of Ægypt, betwene Palestina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madiantites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, hee in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Cite of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the wordes of the Scripture disproouing it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt betwene Cadell and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first for their feete after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had bene wearie, and vnable to relit. Again, in the storie of Isaac it is written: Therefore ISAAC went to ARBAMELECH, and the Philistines vnto Gerar: and I am sure Arbamelech and the Philistines were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where hee describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: by Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth with an honest excuse false his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his first Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Ægypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Prester Iohn; and the West Æthiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the Ruer Niger, which wee call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perorsi, Daraites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prester Iohn, and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, vvhich hee hath of Moses when hee serued Pharaon in the warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus Æthiopia) hee transporteth Madiam by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet HEREMIE, And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, vt bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith PERERIVS, *profecto Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, qua significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (saith PERERIVS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth blacke and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnaueritable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Ishmael, Prince and Priest of Madiam, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madiantite, and not Æthiopiassim, as (with Iosephus) the Geneva conuerts it, though it helpe it a little with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madiam, which is that part of Arabia

Arabia Petraa, bordering the Red Sea, for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from PHARAO into the Land of Madiam, and sate downe by a Well, &c. and againe, in the third of Exodus, When Moses kept the sheepe of IETHRO his father in law, Priest of Madiam, &c. Indee, these foure nations are eury where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madiantites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25, 27. & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madiantites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharaos Steward. The Genevaians, in a marginall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madiantites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were loden with Spicery and Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their Spices they receiued from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chap. it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the sixt of Iudges, That when Israel had sowed, then came vpon the Madiantites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madiantites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madiantites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madiantites onely are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eight Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madiantites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that eury man would giue him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. thickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were agreeat and valiant Nation, and eury inaction of warre. Mannus cius contra omnes, & manna omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and eury mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schemite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabite chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) vse poysen vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-cast are the Madiantites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparant, in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred vp against IEREMIAH, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; So Hierom reads it: the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now, how far it is off betwene the Philistines, and the Negro's, or the Æthiopians, eury man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe & ioine with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirrie, or three & thirrie degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours, but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, are betwene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue bene translated in these words: So the Lord stirred vp against IEREMIAH, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeede are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Æthiopia in Sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ioyneth to Arabia.

Now may we thinke it is probable, or possible, that Moses could beignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no liuing man fo well, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when hee named Gehon, he would haue called the Ruer (into which he was cast vpon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharaon) a Ruer of Egypt, where in he was borne & bred, & wrought so many miracles. Besides, the Ruer of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had bene a Riuer of Paradise, they might iustly haue thought, that he had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall beleue the Fabled of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie, there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Oliues in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Esay, & once in the Prophet Iheremie, and yet in those places it is not said to be a Riuer of Aethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Aethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often gouerned 10 by many little Kings, or hegals, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Calefyrians, with the Mogogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Ierusalem it selfe was held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

C. 1. v. 18.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia, the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Beroaldus lost him- 20 selfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Ri- uers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Ri- uers he also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus, so where to find them else, where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this Riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betwene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more then twenty Englilh miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mis- 30 taken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, & neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited. Hauilah tooke the Riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Hauilah, (now Sustiana): Ra- amah, and Sheba farther downe the Riuer, in the entrance of Arabia felix. NIMROD seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother Mizraim first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in proesse of time, and as 40 their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past ouer into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such Riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Aethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that Brute, or whoseoeuer else that first peopled this Iland, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and calling the Iland after his name Britannia, it might bee said that Thames or Tems was a Riuer that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in proesse of time, the same Brute had also dis- 50 couered and conquered Scotland, which hee also intituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the Riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or lets vs suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phoenicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arriued in the mouth of some Riuer in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as hee first discovered, shall wee in like sort resolve that France, Spain, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them? in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which

which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue bene Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his Successors within a few yeeres after commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chusica. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire founded by Nimrod a yonger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Chus in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and further from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haste creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. yeeres after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted euery Bush and Bryar, Reede and Tree to ioyne themselves (as it were) into one mayne body and Forrest. For if we looke with iudgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall find, that euery Family seated themselves as neare together as poliblie they could, and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times resort, and succour one another by Riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength vsurped dominion ouer the rest, sate downe in the very confluence of all those Riuers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noahs children repa- 20 red; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increase. The first Father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the yongest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as afore- said) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleaned and enriched; so did Hauilah place himselfe vpon Piso-Tigris: Raamah and his sonne Sheba farther downe vpon the same Riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himselfe vpon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselves to the Riuers sides: for Nimue, Charran, Reseph, Canneb, Er in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded vpon these nauigable Ri- uers, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

40 BUT now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram sinuorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aequinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this said soile and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein foeuer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: 50 this Tree alone giueth vnto man whatsoever his life beggett at Natures hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Wormes, with other inconueniences, and then there will be found no comparison betwene the one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) cursed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Vniuersall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants onely proper, and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-lighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, about the middle Region of the Ayre: some, eleuated neere the Moone: others as farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Ayre, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of India, that God planted this Garden, which Eden wee finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A Riuer went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe ioine in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah according to Moses: the true seat of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pisón was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was neuer ioined, cannot be diuided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Riuer of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie, and this Riuer is a greater stranger to Tigris & Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are betwene Tigris and Ganges about foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauielleth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, three score and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographicall description of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receiue an allowance suspended, vntill such time as this description of mine be reproued by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

FOR eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driuen out of Paradise, in exilium vite temporalis, into the banishment of temporall life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and so slipperie, as nothing can fasten them, haue in this also deliuered to the World, an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a proprietie, to preferue both the growing, sensitiue, and rationall life of man; and not onely (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also giuen a duresfull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and blood could be immortall, but that it must once perill and rot, by the vnchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures,

Man

Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyed thereby a long, healthfull, and vngriued life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) he should haue bene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres; and soone after the flood, of two hundred yeeres and vpwards, euen to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceived. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beleefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had bene immortall. But such is the infinite Wisedome of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not haue contained Mankind; or else, that millions of soules must haue bene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue bene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue conceived, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisedome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouercometh, to eate of the Tree of Life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustines answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth euery Tree faire to the sight, and sweete to taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, scale the inuention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they tooke the Plat forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to bee the meate and drinke of the gods.

§. II.

Of Becanus's his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

Now for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed further, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euer ghesse at, whereat Goropius much maruaileth. But as hee had an inuentiue braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, how soeuer his opinion may be valued, yet hee vsurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the inuention be at that price at which hee setteth it. For Moses Bar-cephas faltered on this coniecture about sixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Bar-cephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith hee would induce other men to that beleefe. For Moses Bar-cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-Tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the banks of Acisines, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Floete of Gallies in, or neere the Kingdome of Porsus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree, scilicet semper serens; Alwaies planting it selfe; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroad, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselves vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches ponding downwards, & leaues no lesse then a shield. Aristobolus

Aristobolus affirmeth, that fiftie Horsemen may shadow themselves vnder one of these Trees. Onciscritus rayleth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinie and Onciscritus confirme: to the trunk of which, these Authors giue such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may bee, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiueth, who because hee found it no where else, would needes draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and let it by the Riuer Acclisus. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue scene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner, After they are first shot vp some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, 10 some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunk or stemme; for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy iuyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few months reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vtmost boughes of these yong Trees there fall againe the like cords, which in one yeare and lesse (in that World of a perpetuall Spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight, as arte or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees 20 considered with all his yong ones, may (indeed) throw foure hundred or foure thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downward to finde roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breede, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue scene hie hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauielled a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith 30 hee) was good for meate and plating to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill is described to bee.

Secondly, this Tree hauing so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and Becanus beleueeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eue hid themselves from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could contayne them. But first it is certayne, that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude, as touching the trunk or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger then the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters vnderstood in the plurall number (that is) in the middelt of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Barcephas, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eue hid themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being posselt with shame, did not run vp and downe the Garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse, which Plinie auoweth in these words: Latitudo foliorum peltis effigiem Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield. which also Theophrastus confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis PENTHESILAEA furens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILAEA leades into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to bee beleued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to this his borrowed discouerie, vying this confident (or rather cholericke) speech: Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hac a nobis de sicu hac ex antiquis scriptoris luis cam Moysi narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri posse, quam cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers deliuered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to auow, that any other Tree can bee found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my belief, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: onely thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum pure ac simplicis Obedientie bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, then thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience. Auguſt. de ciuit. Dei, li. 13. c. 22.

¶ III.

Of Becanus his not vnwisly allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

BE Vn in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to bee true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and vpright towards God, vntill such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbrioufnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke and shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, wee haue all remayned in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith hee) to the little vertue, and vnperceiued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it ouer. And as this 30 fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into chollier and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bitterest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to bee their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodness, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and 40 boughes of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather sitting and becoming the vnworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing stateliness, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after hee had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, fought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our finnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintayne which, wee vse so many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world.

¶ IIII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of Adams sinne.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it selfe, Moses Barcephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if hee had beene ignorant before; but as Iunius also noteth: Arbor scientia boni & mali (id est) experientia boni & mali ab eueni; The Tree of Knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men liuing, haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortallitie from the breath or spirit of God, he could not (for these respects) bee ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods Commandement was the fearefullest euill, and the obseruation of his Precepts the happiell good. But as men in perfect health doe (notwithstanding) conceiue, that sicknesse is grieuous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not bee ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the prooue thereof in himselfe another terror then he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euill, which could not be exprest. He then saw himselfe naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, by cause of the euent (as is aforesaid): so was the Well of contention therefore called Elk, and the Well of hatred Sinnath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of Stones, called the heape of witness, betwene Isaac and Laban, not that the stones bare witness, but for a memorie of the Covenants. So Isaac called the house of God Bethel: and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Fuentis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge then he had perceiued in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrows incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glorie which he might obayne by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleading persuasions, vnawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Satan, who laboured to poyson mankind in the very roote, which he moystened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

Mat. 23. 12.

But what meanes did the Deuill find out, or what instruments did his owne sublety present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischief by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; so as by Adams harkning to the voice of his wife, contrary to the expresse commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a Comforter and Companion, but not for a Counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (saith God himselfe.) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the most vgly and vnworthy of all beasts, into whom the Deuill entred and perswaded.

Gen. 3. 17.

Secondly, what was the mooue of her disobedience? euen a desire to know what was most vnfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath euer since remayned in all the posteritie of her sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her persuasions? euen the same cause vvhich hath moued all men since to the like consent, namely, an vnwillngnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest thee should pine and be ouer-come with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of Dauid, Gods chosen seruant, and himselfe a man endued vvhith the greatest wisdomes, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the loue they bare to a Woman; it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages haue beene allured to so many inconuenient and wicked practices, by the perswasions of their wiues, or other be'oued Darlings, who couer ouer and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and vnquietnesse.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betwene the Fall of ADAM, and the Flood of NOAH.

§. I.

Of the cause and the reuenge of CAIN's sinne: and of his going out from God.

THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (enuious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slue him, making himselfe the first Murtherer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnaturall Murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater then he could beare. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and provoked God) hee destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giueth a reason, for saith he, The Earth was filled with euill: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne vnto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with euill thorough them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this euill meant to haue beene in taking away the liues of men only, but in all sorts of Iniustice and Oppression. After this Murther of ABEL, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense; God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non aliteris temporibus, sed eternum, simul; God (saith Saint Augustine) is wholly in Heauen, and wholly in Earth, not by interchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, Dauid witnesseth: If I be in Heauen (saith Dauid) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exijt a facie Dei (saith Chrysostome) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfauoured and bereaued of his protection.

§. II.

Of CAIN's dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

His word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandering or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Iunius; but the Sentence conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, then any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther committed, iustly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and wee call those people Vagabonders and Vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a Citie, and called it by the name of his first-borne, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Iewes; and that as Cain after that he had slaine Abel vniuallly, had thenceforth no certaine abiding in the World: so the Iewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer since any certaine Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne vpon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soeuer, which in old time liued by Pastorage, and fed (as

And that Cain inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Gen. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence hee was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus hee cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text, Cain also in the same Region fought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Ned or Naid doe signifie profane, that is, a figure, we can geue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Cain, then till he built the Citie of Euech, the first of the World, which hee inclosed either for his owne defence, or (as Iesephus writteth) to oppress others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am resolved with the Separingins, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain vseth of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as trauielleth in feare 20 of reuengement: for whosoever sindeih me (saith Cain) shall slay me, or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.

And because the Henachians, so called of the Citie Henach, were the first societie and civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these people (either for crueltie, strength, or other actions) hued in the memorie of Noah and his Sonnes; so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some virtuously, some impiously disposed, and every a time misdefering before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in crueltie and oppression tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henachians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Henach flood before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments might remaine (as the Pillars or the foundation of Ioppe did) gaue occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henachians there were many Nations in the borders of Pomus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the same name many Mountaines, as those which are otherwise called Caracis. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsell of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therewith satisfie our fancies, if of so great and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & Nations there remain any print or foot-steps to Posterity.

In * Plinie, P. Orel, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, wee finde those Henochoi described, though diuerfly written, as in Plinie, Sometimes Henochoi, in Mela Enochi, in Flaccus Henochoi, in Lucan Enochyl, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the Eastside of Eden, or (according to Nofes wordes) Eastward from Eden. For Nofes, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he vseth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleuenth wee writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word 'towards' as, in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations tooke name of Henoeh the Citie of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was reepeopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henoeh of Calchis, & other parts adjoining, were not the first of that name, after the Sonnes of Noah began to fill the World againe; because, had this Henoeh the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pline findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, & till he tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For hee calleth these of Calchis (now Atengrelia) Sami Henoehis Ptolomei Zan, beyond which an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond theſe he againe diſcouereth a third Nation, from whence all theſtooke beginning, which inhabited on the Welt ſide of the Mountaines of Papir-puniſus, betwene them and the great Riuer of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North ſide; and theſe Henochy are due Eaſt from the Region of Eden, and Eaſtward from the very Garden it ſelfe.

And although we cannot bee assured, that these Henchij tooke name from the memorie of the Citie of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Welfard (as all Noahs Sonnes did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is farre more probable, then that of Animus the Frier, who sets Henchij in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phunisia from all parts of Eden being directly Welf.

And besides these feuerall Nations of the Hemochij, Stephanus findeth a Region called Hemochia, and the samealls in the East, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Sagadiana, of the same name. Only the Gracians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things else) out of the word (Hemochij) which signifieth Carts or Coach-men; make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Cassar and Pellux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprize of Iafon into Calchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Iafon with other Grækes reared the Coats of Asia the of MOSES his omitting sundry things concerning CAINS Generation.

30 BYr of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Citie of Henoch in prophane Storie, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certaine particularities in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (having no other alliance then his Sonne Henoch) to performe such a Worke as the building of a Citie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses vlieth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Storie of the first Race, which lasted by the least account, 1616. yeares, in fise thort Chapters. Yet thus much may every man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bellow on the first Generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. 40 yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and meanes to build many rich Cities as Henoch, be the capacite answering to what other of the World foucer: for in what Age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whole times, and the times of his Illiues Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that he built a City: so was it said of Noah, that his three Sonnes peopled all the World, but in both, the proccesse of time required to be vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vlieth where the space lesseth require it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Enit anno post dies multos et a fine diurnum (that is) in proccesse of time, it 50 came to passe that Cain brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort: to bee vnderstood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased, he built the Citie of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee built the Temple of Hierusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon, that he employed in that Worke, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our felues to say, The King invaded; when he caused an invasion to be made : and hee built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains Issues, it is not to be marvailed at, why he also

Gen. 4. 17. passed over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare HENOCHE, and he built a City, and called the name of the City after the name of his sonne HENOCHE. And to HENOCHE was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHVIAEL, and MEHVIAEL begat METHVSABL, and METHVSABL begat LAMECH.
 C. 5. v. 5. Now of Seth, Moses writeth farre otherwise, and in this manner. And Seth lived an hundred and five yeares, and begat ENOCH, and Seth lived after he begat ENOCH 807 yeares, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: Thus all the dayes of SETh were 912 yeares, and he dyed: as for the yeares & times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro viuentium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in; and finished it with care, passing over the Reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembereth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

2 Cain.	7 Lamech, who by	2 Seth	7 Henoch.
3 Henoch.	Ada had	3 Enosh.	8 Mathusalem.
4 Irad.	8 Tubal and Tubal, &	4 Cainan.	9 Lamech, and
5 Mahiuel.	by Silla Tubalcain,	5 Mahaleel.	10 Noah.
6 Mathusalem.	and Noëma.	6 Jared.

Gen. 11. 10, 11, 12. These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Iosephus giueth vnto Lamech threecore and seuentene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wiues Ada and Silla: and to these three Sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the Inuention of Pastorage, of Musicke, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Tubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vntamed, and brought them into Heards and Droues: Tubal inuented Musicke, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to Idleness and Pleasure. In whom beganne these three meaner degrees of Shepheards, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Seruices of God, Diuinitie, Prophecie, and Astronomie: the Children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

IV.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

Second scruple hath bene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their Children at so diuers Ages, as Cainan or Kenan at seuentie yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threecore and hie yeares, whereas Jared begat not any of his vntill he was 162 yeares old: Mathusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot bee conceived, that either Jared, Mathusalem or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threecore and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-borne of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but so that Noah might haue had many Sonnes before Shem, Ham and Japhet, though these three were only named, and suruiuing, and which by God were reserved to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to bee begotten by Kenan at threecore and ten yeares who was the first Sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187 yeares of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reiecteth all the other Sonnes of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because hee was the Father of Noah as aforesaid.

Of this Saint

Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth and one and twentieth Chapters, De Ciuitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, & so to Abraham, and the children of the Promise after him, so doth Saint Matthew recite the Genealogie of Christ, not by the eldest sonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-borne, who haue hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitorie only; and therefore the Euangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael was first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esaue the elder; neither is Christ deriued from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simon, or Leui, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from Dauid a younger sonne of Iessai; and lastly, we find, that the Kingdome it selfe of Juda was not giuen to the Heire in Nature, but to the Heire of Grace, namely Salomon.

V.

Of the long lines of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

The third Obiection is, that the great difference of yeares betwene those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well-neere seene a thousand yeares, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing, that soone after the Flood, men liued not a third part of that time, and in succeeding Ages and to this day, not the tenth.

They that haue heron resolved that those yeares were but Lunarie yeares, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the yeare of his life an hundred and fise, if those yeares bee taken but for Moneths, then had Seth liued but eight yeares, and one Moneth when hee begat Enosh: & if the time of Enosh haue the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time haue bene but like yeares and fortie eight weekes old; and so it may bee gathered of the rest excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and feed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an abilitie of Generation at six, seuen or eight yeares, agreeeth with the short liues of the Pigmies, and not with the continuations of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the Word, had length of dayes and abilitie of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunarie yeares, then there would follow this extremity, that those which liued longest, and vpwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of fourescore and ten and odd yeares; which were not only lesse by farre then the Patriarchs liued after the Flood, but short of many mens liues in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourescore, & some a hundred yeares. Further (if need be) to disproue this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 21. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeares) makes but seuentene and an halfe of our yeares.

And if we seeke for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it unreasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget Children of equal strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there must of necessity spring vp the fairest and fruitfulllest Plants. Secondly, the Earth it selfe was then much lesse corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmefull qualitie, as since that time the Curse of God for the crueltye of mans heart brought on it and Mankind: Neither had the Waters of the Flood infused such an impuritie, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits vpon the Earth receiued a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of strength, and another of weaknesse, a youth & beautie, and then age and deformitie: so Time it selfe (vnder the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath waited and worne out that liuely vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea, the Heauens themselves being of a most pure and clenfed matter, shall waxe old as a Garment; and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receiue operative Vertue from the superiour.

But besides the olde age of the World, how farre doth our education and simplicitie of liuing differ from that old time: the tender bringing vp of Children, first fedde and nourished with the Milke of a strange Dugge; an vnnaturall curiositie hauing taught all Women (but the Begger) to find out Nurles, which necessitie only ought to commend vnto them: The hastic Marriages in tender yeares, wherein, Nature being but yet Greene and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her selfe hath not yet any root sufficient to maintaine her owne top; and such halfe-ripe Seeds (for the most part) in their growing vp wither in the bud, and wax old euen in their Infancie. But aboue all things the exceeding luxurioufnesse of this gluttonous Age, wherein wee presse Nature with ouer-weightie burdens, and finding her strength defective, wee take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of strong Waters, hot Spices, and prouoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Phar. 4.

*O prodigiarum
Luxuries, nunquam paruo contenta parauit:
Et questorum terra pelagoq; ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & lauta gloria mensae,*

*Discite quam paruo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum Natura petat.
Non auro myrrhâq; bibunt: sed gurgite puro Vita redit: satius est populus suauisq; Cerej.*

O wastfull Riot, neuer well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea farre fetcht and sent:
Vaine glorie of a Table sumptuous,
Learne with how little life may be preferred,
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to carouse,
But with the Brooke the peoples thirst is seru'd:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not steru'd.

The Aegyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect bodie waxeth and groweth to strength fiftie yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophie, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twentie yeares, and Bersus to a hundred and seauenteen yeares. These opinions Plinie repeateth and reprooueth, producing many Examples to the contrarie. In the last taxation, number and reuiew of the eighth Region of Italie, there were found in the Roll (saith Plinie) foure and fiftie persons of an hundred yeares of age: euen & fiftie of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and fife and twentie: foure, of an hundred and thirtie: as many that were hundred and fife & thirtie, or hundred and seuen and thirtie yeares old: & last of all three men of an hundred and fortie: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Sonne.

Pier. Hierog. 1.

The simple dyet and temperate life of the Egyptians gaue them long account of many yeares: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Nestor liued three Ages, and Tiresias six, Sybilla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the lesse Asia little lesse: Also Masaniassa of Numidia liued very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeares (saith Ephorus). Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeares: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that these reports are not fabulous; Iosephus bringeth many witness with him selfe, as Narethion, Berosus, Mochus, Elius, Hieronymus Aegyptius, Hecateus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeare 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Armie, who had out-liued three hundred yeares. I my selfe knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Inchiquin in Müller, who liued in the yeare 1580. and many yeares since, who was marryed in Edward the Fourths time, and held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness. Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Massans, and the like Authors, telleth of some that haue not only far exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but beene repayed from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if wee note but the difference betweene the abilitie of men in those dayes wherein Galen the Physician liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and and thin Ayre, and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heauy load of abundance, wherewith we oppresse & ouercharge Nature, maketh her to sinke vnawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Aire, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

Fourth scruple hath bene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Storied thereof written, and if any such had bene, yet it is conceiued, that all memorie of Antiquitie perished in the vniuersall Flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policie of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men fought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publique dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wise men to a posteritie equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdraus, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Atrandula conceiue) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but with all, secretum em & verum legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he deliuered by mouth to Iosuah, and Iosuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas, then to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as seru'd in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the inuention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

Dion. Arop.

Fol. 8.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiuing in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittaines, and of later times by the Irish Chronicles called Rymers. If then such as would seeme wisest in the vse of reason, will not acknowledge, that the storie of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliuered vnto him by a more certaine presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniurie of the time and other hazards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred fortie and three yeares, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse then fife hundred yeares: and before Noah died, Abraham was fiftie and eight yeares old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinarie way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the verie infancie of the World, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch. of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remayned euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Iude telleth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and storie

of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Cerintian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gaseus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions, allegeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was deluged by Tradition from the Jewes. But I rather thinke with Pererius, that such a Booke there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added therunto by Heretikes, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquitie thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Deuill about the bodie of Moses, to frame and adde therunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neyther Philo, nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquitie) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Augustine, Scriptisse quidem nonnulla diuina Enoch illam septimum ab Adam negare non possumus: That ENOCH the seventh from ADAM did write diuine things we cannot denie. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquitie, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Booke was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Iudaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preferred by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Iude, no man can denie; by which they were deliuered to posteritie I know not, whether by the tenes Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heauens, and of the Natures and coniunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is verie probable that Noah had scene and might preferre this Booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seib to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath bene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seib to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methusalem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the vndoubted word of God need of any other prooffe then self-authority.

Of the men of renowne before the Flood.

NOW let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seib ten: Seib being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seib was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publickely to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seib, to the time of Enoch the sonne of Iared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more scene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah: Noah was a iust and vpright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seuentie conuert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (uit cum Deo: scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) he died, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh betwene the pietie of Enoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs, Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses vseth these words, And he died; but of Enoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, he was missing, or he was not scene. Et non inueniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transfudit: And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch was not with the same kind of changing, which Satan promiseth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all dye, but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Diuines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth ouer to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophesied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seib, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Familie) preferred, because hee was an vpright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the warr, peace, gouernement, and policie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memorie remaying: whose stories if they had bin preferred, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the World, there could nothing of more delight haue bene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of necessitie must the same adde of wisdome and vnderstandings? Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus preceps; (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses; These were mightie men, which in old time were men of renowne. But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and crueltie of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the pietie of Seib, and the wises wherein Enoch walked: for all their imaginations of their hearts were euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersal, when the children and sonnes of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and mis-led by their idolatrous wises, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, losing themselves and the world only.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely, Luchastus and Ensebius, mis-led by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great aduantage, and haue troubled themselves with large answers and very needlesse: the question being vncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostome and S. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) beheld the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his Commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fel with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrarie both to Nature and Grace, were more then madnesse to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

IF these Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Coropius became an Anturpian (who thought his owne wit more Gigantically then the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strayed his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (whosoever desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyriacus reproues the Grecians Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelesly,

That

That the Giants haue in elder times not onely cast vp Mountaines vpon Mountaines, but remoued Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp Hills, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the storie of Nimrod, as before remembred; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the Earth the Daughters of men: which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Cusam (who hath written a witty discourse of this subject) thus changed into Latine:

Nomine caelestes illos dixit Gigantes, Orti quod terrâ fuerint & sanguine cali.

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heauen, they came,
Whom thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opinators and selfe-beleeuing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceit that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times since? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue straying of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants, and therefore had abilitie to oppress; then say, That they were called Giants onely, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himselfe calleth them mightie men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vnder-taking and aduenturous action. And if the same stature of body, and abilitie had not beene found among diuers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly harkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will referre to accompanie the Giants of Albion, in the storie of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerely and without all allegorical construction auow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Iosua, and of Dauid; namely, the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Enims, which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims: Likewise, where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon, he vseth these words: That also was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: & whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouer-threw, assisted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oke; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Basan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad: for onely Og King of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, four hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words: All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sonnes of Anak, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our sights like Grasshoppers, and so wee were in their sights, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a marvellous difference betweene the Anakims and themselves: inso much that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather sought and desired to returne againe into Agypt, and were more willing to endure their former slauierie, then to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of sixe cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore weighed sixe thousand shickles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a Weauers beame, and his speare-head weighed sixe hundred thickles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath of another Goliath, surnamed Gethens, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slaine by Iehonathan, Dauids Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure & twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had bene a Kid, and after slue thirtie of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a law-bone of an Asse: And lastly, hee tooke the gates of Azazab, and the two Posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approued by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it selfe) infeebled and almost worn out the vertue of all things, then I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautifull, than it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mightie men, and men of renowne as farre exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembred by Moses of his owne time, and after him their successors, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in general, soone after the flood and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and new-nesse of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially in crueltie and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gaue end to all flesh, but to chiefti Noah and his Family. And God repented him that hee had made man, which S. Augustine thus expoundeth: Neq. enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui puniet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa prescientia. Sed si non videtur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & perierat superbie, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quarentes, & alai intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men vs to doe) but if the Scripture did not vse those words or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that vnderstand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

Ere before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deluening it out in a mystical sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might recieue those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Bookes of God. But as a skillfull and learned Chrysostom can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poysen, as poysen out of the most healthfull herbes and plants (all things hauing in themselves both life and death) so, contrarie to the purposes and hopes of the Heathens, may those which seeke after God and Truth finde out euery where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Seem of the first Age, with all the works and manuales thereof, amply and liuely express.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were verie ancient : as in the Family of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

BVt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberal grace of God being with drawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the general flood could not so wath out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sum did inherite the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chal-deans began soone after the flood to ascribe diuine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phoenicians did not onely learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue seuerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, eosque prius aras, & imagines, & templa suis sibi creasse; The Egyptians (saith he) first deuised the names of the twelue gods, which the Greeks receiued from them, who first erected vnto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

§. III.

That in proceesse of time these lesser errors grew on greater : as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BVt as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander foreuer more in vices vnknewen, and daily trauaile towards their eternall perdition :
so did these grosse and blind Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and thinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gaue diuine reue-rence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Palenesse, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner :

Nat. com. l. 1. c. 7.

Rouem colis, ego Deis mæsto bouem.

Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas : ego Obsoniorum credidi suauissimum.

*Carnes suillas tu caues, at gaudeo
Illi maxime : canem colis, quem verbero
Edentem ubi deprehendo fortè obsonium.*

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.
I broyle the Egyptian Eeles, which you (as god) implore:
You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.
You worship Dogges, to beate them I thinke meet,
When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner I VERNAL.

*Porcum aut cape nefas violare aut frangere morsu :
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina !*

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to root vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holy rite :
O happy Nations, which of their owne sowing Hauē store of gods in euerie Garden growing !

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols &
Fables were inuented : and that the first IVPITER was CAIN, VULCAN, TYRBALEIN, &c.

BVt in so great a confuson of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient patterne they erected their building, were it not certayne, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or metall remayning after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be sayned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcanes, and Mercuries with the rest, which S. Auguiline out of Varro; Eusebius out of many pro-phane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Anobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygiens, Cretians, Greek, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne : for Iupiter was said to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochy before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higium in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For, besides that many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen prima latissima a primo & antiquissimo Ioue edificata : yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient IVPITER, seated in the East parts, or in Asia, according to that of Moses :
And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochy were found after the Flood. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Poliens, a Founder of Cities, and Hercios, an incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phormionus and Pau-sanias) and that to Iupiter Hercios there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increace, they built many Cities; which as his meaning he deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes: for he saith, that Cities were built annexed space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Iupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adams, who marrying his owne Sister (as also Iupiter is said to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de viribus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Iudeus conceiue that Cain built sixe others, as Machylared, Tebe, Iesca, Seler, and Gebat; but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the inuention of Sacrifice: so were Tubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (inuēntors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Metick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name betwene Tubalcain and Vulcan; so doth Auguiline expound the name of Naema or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Fruifull, or beautifull, Voluptas, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Ladie of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Iupiter, Ena, Rhea, and Naema or Naamath the first Venus : so did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betwene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne arise, from the true Storie of the diuiding of the Earth betwene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah : so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent; which templed Eubab : so was Paradise itselfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides : the prophecies, that Christ should breake the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captiuating Cerberus : so out of the taking vp of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conuerfion of their Heroes (the inuēntors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heavenly Signes, and (withall) that leauing of the World, and ascension of Astræa; of which Ouid:

*Ultima celsum terras Afræa reliquit ;
Astræa last of heavenly Wights the Earth did leaue :*

For although thereby the Ethnickes would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue fayled, as it is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet as it is visuall among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beautie or Lust by Venus, so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices, and therefore by Iustice and Astraea, Enoch: the iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was said to be a iust man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more scene: for God tooke him away.

From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembrieth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mightie kings, and men of renowne) did they steale their wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vnderaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cornelius Seuerus thus describeth:

Tentauere (nefas) olim destrudere mundo Sydera, captiuq; Iovis transferre Gigantes Imperium, & victo leges imponere caelo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe;
And robbing Ioue of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heauens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the starres, should bury them vnder the moystrure of a second Flood, but that by this building (if they had beene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Aeneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. Who when he read the Booke of the Couenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

Ioseph. 1. 1. contra

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Enoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and successour Sethos, of Seth; and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preferred, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Prouince Setheutica. We also finde in Bithynia the Citie of Setbia, and others of the same name elswhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Gracians borrow this kinde of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elswhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefeſt IVPITERS; and the strange storie of the third.

BUt of all those armies of Iupiters remembered by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Aether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celeſtiall conditions (for aether is as much as shining or pure fire); the other diſcouered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witness of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Caelum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The

The third of whom all the Gracian fables were deuised, was of Creet (now Candia), the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iunans Father, from the Greeke word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strayed. Boccar in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiueth, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that starre had such a name, before the same was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Iupiter; but how soeuer they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howsoeuer deferred) as the worthiest, that euer were, acquired by their well deservings. Iouis omnes Reges vocant antiqui, The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERS, as Tzetzes in his Varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Iovis vocant omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERS. But where this last and most remembered Iupiter was borne, it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Creet: others, that he was but sent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be fostered and hid: from the furie of Titan his vncl: because it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a younger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titans permission, hee should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is sayned that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine;

Hand sit pinguior, | Saturne to be the fatter, is not knowne,
Crudis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filij. | By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This composition betweene Titan and Saturne, Sylla also witnesseth in these; Conceptis verbis; TITAN inuare coegit SATVRNVM, de se natum ne matris vllum, Quo possint regnare jens post sua Nepotes.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne swear
No sonne to nourish; which by reigning might Vsurpe the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iuno, conuoyed Iupiter (first called Iysanias) into Creet, as thee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought vp in Gnosus, the chiefe Citie of that Island, by Cressa the King, or by the Cretes, a people and nation thereof.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme, that hee was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof hee changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a god: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes haue many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he set on him, and tooke him and his wife prisoners, whom Iupiter againe rescued and deliuered.

But lastly, the father and the sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerfull fled into Italie, and left his Kingdomes in Creet to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after hee was once seeled and became potent, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adulterie, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith satisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others; and did not onely begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Iuno, but hee rauished, betrayed, stole away, and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greater fame, Niohe, Laodamia, and Alcmena, the wife of Amphitryon, by whom hee had Pelagius, Sarpdon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus; of whom the Mountayne Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Sauna:

by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Lada, Castor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus: by Iordana, Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protegeia, he had Athlus the father of Endymion: and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphus in Aegypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Country tooke name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. Hee rauilhed Aegina the daughter of Aefopus, and carryed her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aeacus: by Torrhobia hee had Archeilaus and Carvius: by Ora, Colaxes: hee had also Dardanius by Electra, who built Dardanum, afterward Ilium and Troy. He begat the brothers Talieson, on Thalia, and on Garamantiu, Hiarhas. He had besides these (if they beleye not their chiefe God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inueters of Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were borne in ages so farre differing. And of these his seuerall rauishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens wiues, daughters, and sonnes, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into thowres of gold, eagles, buls, birds, and beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Gracian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans feare to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke, de natura Deorum, affirme, that hee deserued nothing lesse; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Pyriper. His buriall was in Crete (saith L. V. C. I. A. N.) Cretenses non solum natum apud se & 20 sepultum torem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt; The Cretians or Candians doe not onely auow that Iupiter was borne and buried among them, but they shew his grave and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remayned the monuments of his tombe in the Mountayne Iafus. This Callimachus in his hymnes also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, saith thus:

The Cretians euer lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu'lt alway.

Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greeke Writers, that the original of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africke. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Phanus (which significth Heauen) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god after his death. He had by many wiues 45. sons; but by his principall wife Titea, he had seuentene sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that shee for her goodnesse was canonized as a goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heauen. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Bastila (which name sounding as Queene in English, shee is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as farre in vertue as in yeares, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her fathers death, being 40 as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sunne and Moonne. The beautie and towardlinesse of these children moued her brethren to enuy, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified vnto her in a dreame, that hee and his sister, by the prouidence of God, should become immortall, that also the Sunne and Moonne should bee called by their names, 50 and that their death should bee reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her selfe as a goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, vvhich name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren vvhilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other sonnes of Phanus diuided the Kingdom. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the countries lying about the Mountaynes, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deeply skillfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Sphere, said to haue supported Heauen. He

He had many sonnes; but the principall of them called Hesperus, being of his fathers qualities and studies, was said to haue bene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his contemplations, and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the morning starre. The seuen daughters of Atlas were also said to haue bene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or registred among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen starres called Pleiades tooke name. Saturne, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africke and Italie. Jupiter, another of the sonnes of Phanus, reigned in Crete; who had ten sonnes which 10 he called Curetes; he called that Iland after his wiues name, Idea; in which Ile hee dyed, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not haue bene that great one, but vnto the great Jupiter, if these fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africke. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerua, neare to the Riuer Triton, whom thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthea a sonne called Bacchus, whom hee caused fiercely, for feare of his life, to be brought vp at Nysa, an Iland in the Riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerua, and certayne Nymphs. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly 20 Country, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, shee fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely entercayned her as a sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before mentioned, held the Iland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women, as may seme, being very gracious in those times) the Kingdom. Bacchus was growne a proper yong man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind, 30 before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was coming against him with the Titanes; hee leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons, liuing not farr from Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaued himselfe so well, that he vvan the loue of all the people by vvhom he passed; insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred 40 of Saturnes rigorous government, he was greatly strengthened, and the enemies as much as infected by daily reuolts. Comming to the Citie of Hammon, he wan a battaile of Saturne, before the very walls. After which, Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong sonne by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child, Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East Countries; and comming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a boy, Gouernour of the Country; but appointed vnto him as an Ouer-seer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilste Bacchus trauielled through all Nations, as farr as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and 50 began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerua, together with the rest, that afterwards were held as gods, ioyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke, and slue them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Jupiter, the sonne of Saturne, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes left alieue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betwene this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true historie. For the Expeditions of Osiris, and of Pacchus; the warres of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the Kingdome of Egypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Baschus to Iupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the cymbals of Basilea, with many petty circumstances, needly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniat (as Ensebius cites him) would have all these to be Phenicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no allegorie. Yet hee makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Phanus or Heauen for daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus haue enough. To the Genealogie he addes Elius or the Sunne, as father of Phanus, and among the children of Phanus, Iapetus, Batilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giuing withall to Phanus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturne, but omitting Iupiter of Crete. The Pedegree of them is this:

¶ VI.

¶ V.

of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

EF Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greekes but Saluages, if they seeke no farther off for their Gods.

But the Egyptians, euen after the flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizraim, Iupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Erymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucez) neither yet is his owne much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signififieth heate: because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes and Romans the most renowned) it is certaine that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his sonnes is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which liued in that age of Priamus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathen; it was not to be wondered at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbered among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deitie be denied vnto Laurentia and Flora, which was giuen to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

¶ VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

ET that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleeued in any of these fooleries, it cannot bee suspected, though some of them (ouer-busily) haue mixed their owne inuentions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpentes. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the books of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatise conuerted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though hee dissembled in some things, for feare of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirifice is delectatus est, que de vno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howsoever Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the lawes, and bookes of Moses: Ensebius, Cyrrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleuee the contrarie, thinking that from thence hee tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or fauouring of Diuinitie: and the same opinion had Saint Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanitie, which possesse all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which hee had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the seueritie of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson, I cannot iudge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to *Plato*s feare, whose words among many other of the same effect, are these; Plato Mosis mentionem facere, ob id, quod vnum solumq; Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses inuicem non putauit, veritus Areopagum; Plato fearing the Areopagites thought it not safe to mention the name of Moses; He discouered and taught the same of God (saith Iustine Martyr) which Moses did. For whereof pleased God by his Angell to answer Moses Ego sum existens (which is) I am; and, existens, nescit me aduersus; I am hath sent me vnto you, herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ then that Moses vsed the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses enim qui existis (inquit,) Plato quod quod existit; For MOSES saith, He who is, PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same, he giueth this testimonie: Genitorem vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quam inuentum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maiestic of Gods Nature, then this propertie by PLATO acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause as all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factiens mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The loue of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. APVLEIUS the 10 Platonist: Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam nature dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similis & gratius, quam vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cepit; Because he neuer had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, because God was euery where present and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses florid of the Creation, then this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

Calum terraq; vnius forme fuit:

Sed cum fuissent abinuita amplexu mutus,
Emergit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, ferae, quaq; affert mare,
Genusq; mortalium.

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when disioyned once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then,
Of trees, birds, beastes, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we find the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who euery where expresse the infinite and sole power of one God, though he vse the name of Iupiter, thereby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time; but that hee could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which hee doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDVLA) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipientium damnum, à quibus malum & non bonum pronenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Devils, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall & diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musaeus, and the Hymne following teach vs: Respicens vero ad diuinum hunc sermonem ea diligenter animus aduerte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascendende viam, & solum apice mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse vero in diu versatur, nec quisquam eum inueniri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes instruit.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reason's sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone
All else; in which hee's still, nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee sees all.

And againe the same Author,

Iupiter omnipotens, & primus, & vltimus idem;
Iupiter est caput & medium: Iouis omniunus.
Iupiter est fundamen humi & stellantis Olympi.
Iupiter & mater est, & semina nescia mortis.
Spiritus est cunctis, validi vis Iupiter ignis.
Et pelagi radix, SOL, LVNA, est Iupiter ipse
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius occuluit, magno post numine, sacrum
Cor referans bonus in dulcem dedit omnia lucem.

The first of all is GOD, and the same last is he.
God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be.
God is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, I shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is GOD, the SVNNE and MOONE, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end,
For close in holy brest he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Gracians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeate two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Euagabinus, Pencer, Pleſus, Daneu, and others. For Clementis the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, iustus, sanctus, scriptum possidens, vtilis, speciosus, optimus, seuerus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, iust, holy, possesing himselfe, profitable, beautifull, best, seuer, free, alwayes doing good, safe without feare, glorious and selfe-charitie. EPICHAEMVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euery nature, was only and euery where powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS: Rex omnium ipse solus; Hee is the only King of Kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator summus, atq; optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diuersos secundum merita praeber; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giueth to euery thing diuers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith ANTISTHENES) cannot bee resembled to any thing, and therefore not elswhere knowne; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes: Saue onely in that euertlasting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. HERCOT also XENOPHANES COLOPHONIUS: Vnus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like vnto mortals: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quati,

& omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensq; quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mightie, as is manifest to all: but of what forme hee is, it is manifest to none, saue onely to himselfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato saith: Totius rerum naturae causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi generator, aeternus animantium sospitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neg. loco, neg. tempore vltro comprehensus, eoq; pauci cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soules, the euertlast preseruer of liuing creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceiue himi in thought, none can expresse what hee is. Therefore was it said by S. HIEROME, *Sic enim cunctos Philosophorum reuoluit libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, ut apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: in ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal soules, &c. And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wisdom of all Ages, wee shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose minde the Arte of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sower, and by a pensile inspektion on aduised; but that he hath found by an vnriftable necessitie, one true God, and euertlasting being, all for euery causing, and all for euery sustayning; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, then that Egyptian Hermes, howsoeuer it fayled afterward in his posteritie: all being at length by deuilish policie of the Egyptian Priests purposely obfured; who inuented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.*

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under IULIAN miraculously confounded.

In all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fuelle starueth, water quencherh, and want of ayre suffocateh: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, their stately Temples of stone and duresfull Marble. The houles and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the Earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phanicia, that lament the death of Adonis, nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollos Priests are become speechlesse; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfuit Aegyptians, and cozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouer-throwes and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed: yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repayed, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it received the last and vtter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Euboean Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sackt; Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phoenices: Sixthly, by Nero, who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered betwene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remayned till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the Image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten downe and lost in the earth.

The like successe had the Tewes in the same Julians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Hierusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Tewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others slaine, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Tewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Iudea, being by Julian busied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neere the foundation, and oft consuming the Workemen, made the enterprise frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

Now the Deuill, because hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as euer: findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectfull adoration of himselfe then euer. For whereas hee first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idoll of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that truth is the Goddesse of dangers and oppressions: that chastitie is the enemy of Nature; and lastly, that as all vertue (in generally) is without taste: so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth eueray sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obtrayning of power to oppress, and of riches to maintayne plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician find in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of Gods future Iudgement, he perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that he

he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeuours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged poetrie, and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouer-grown with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperitie by the other: at the entrance of the one wee find our sufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetousnesse, licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemy was euer most diligent: so is he now more laborious than euer: the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an euening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.
OF NOAH'S Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAH'S Flood.

F this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regionem Ioseph. l. i. c. 4. migravit: He departed with his children, and traualled into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berosus writeth in this manner: That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnatural wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religionis & Deorum, contemptors of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (saith Berosus) vnus erat qui Deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods then the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sonnes Sem, Iaphetus, and Cham, and with their Wiues, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Tisca the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noela) preferred themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God sayd vnto NOAH, Make thee an Arke of Pine-trees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell Generations were already fashioned in the Cloudes, which soone after should swallow vp and couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the Ayre: Noah and his family excepted.

But this vnuerfall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not bene receiued by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum obuoluta in obscura veritas latet: Whilst the truth lieth wraps up in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniversalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue bene many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Iosephus: *Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca decessum in huius vertice habisse, lignorumq; reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam Moses Indacorum Legislator scribit: thus saith this Author. There is (saith he) about Minyada (or the Countrey of Minya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saued in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountaine, whereon there remayned a long time after certayne pieces thereof; and this might bee the same, of which Moses the Law-giuer of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the*

Talmudists (saith Annins) that many Giants faued themselves vpon Mount Sion.

But Herofus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, how soeuer he haue bene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: An-te apurum eladem famolam, qua vniuersus perijt Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World vniuersall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, and his three Sons with their wiues (in all eight persons) were only faued.

¶ II.

of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

But from the vanitie of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth, (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perwade the world, that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in haotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodoginus) Ogyges id appellat Poete, tanquam peruenit dixeris, ab Ogyge vetustissimo: The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he liued but in Iacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he firre later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autem hunc: unde sit Cadmus qui in Graeciam profectus Thebas condidit, a boue inculato si nuncupatus; quoniam Syrorum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this Ogyges did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who translating into Greece built Thebes so named of a beeste slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a beeste is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. betwene these Floods, wanting but 30 two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet who soeuer makes it most ancient, finds about 300. yeeres difference betwene that and the generall Flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040 yeeres before Rome built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betwene these two Floods must be 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Prifus, as some doe) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Aegean Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie, and Solinus witnesse, that the Citie of Ioppen in Iudea was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remained on certayne Altars of Stone the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: first, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Flood of Ogyges spred it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed vp (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus) of which Ouid:

*Si queras Helicon, & Bura, Achaidos vrbes.
Inuenies sub aquis.*

lib. 15. 303.*

*Si queras Helicon, & Bura, Achaidos vrbes,
Inuenies sub aquis.*

Bura and Helice, on Achaia ground
Are fought in vaine, but vnder Sea are found.

lib. 15. 303.*

Of this Flood of Ogyges was inuented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Cæus, the sonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with child, Iuno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be deliuered on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow & affright her, where soeuer she travelled: till at length arriuing at the Ile of Orygia, she was there receiued; in which she was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins: whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrification being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogges, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegean Sea, neyther the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Orygia espied the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Orygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges being so great, as Histories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was scene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrastus Cylicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read of so good Astrologers flourishing among the Greekes, or elsewhere in those dayes, as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets so exact, that it should need no reformation Of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous, considering, that lesser mists and fogges than those which couered Greece with so long darknesse, doe familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, dectrying onely that part whereon the light shilleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things vnknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to haue bene discovered in Venus, by his late obseruations. Whether some watric disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that liued with Ogyges, as Galileus hath scene through his Instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discouerie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather conuince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was general, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or fore-shewing, then the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and tooke them all away.

Of DEUCALIONS Flood: and that this was not NOAHs Flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any universall Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which, S. Augustine time out of Varro: His temporibus (vs VARRO scribit) regnante Atheniense CRANAO, successore CEROPIS (vs antem nostris, EVSEBIVS & HIERONYMVS) adine eodem CEROPIS permancnte, diluvium fuit, quod appellatur est DEUCALIONIS: (that is) In these times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANAVS the successor of CEROPIS governing the Athenians, or (as our EVSEBIVS and HIEROME say) CEROPVS yet living, that Flood (called DEUCALIONS) happened.

Hierome say) CECROPS yet liuing, the thirde Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, he vseth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Aegypto populum Dei nonisimo tempore CECROPIS Athenensium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret ASCATADES, apud Sycionios MARATHVS, apud Argiuos TRIOPAS: MOSES led the people of God out of Aegypti about the latter times of CECROPIS King of the Athenians, ASCATADES reigning ouer the Assyrians, ouer the Sycionians MARATHVS, and ouer the Argines TRIOPAS. So as leauing the curiositie of a few yeeres, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Flood of Decalution was cyther at the egregiollon of the children of Israel out of Aegypti, or neere it: and then after Noah 753.
 yeeres, according to Funditus, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeere of the World 2409. 20 or if we follow Aterator, then 759. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Decalution were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Cade- man; then giuing vnto Decalution 40. yeeres of age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one yeere of Aterators account. But Decalution by all approved Historiours is said to haue bene 82. yeeres old at that time. Now Clement Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Decalution, and the conflagration and burning in Phaetons time, by the reigne of Crotopus, King of the Argines; but Crotopus liued King of the Argines sixe yeeres after Israel departed Aegypti, which makes twentie yeeres difference, according to Funditus, who will haue this Flood and Burning to haue fallen 14. yeeres before Moses Isis, Aegypti: the same of the Worlds yeeres to the Flood and Burning the yeere 2440. 30 and to Moses his egression the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion and the burning of Phaeton preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all. Cedrenus also of Myra (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 50. yeeres, or thereabouts. Eufebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and so doth P. Orosius: Eufebius about the 50. yeere of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Flood 770. yeeres: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Graecia tempore quidam PHORONEI, qui fuit post INACHUM, inundatio qua fuit tempore OGYGIS: Tunc haec happened in Graecia in the time of PHORONEUS, who liued after INACHUS, the Flood of OGYGES. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Eufebius and Orosius, (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrewes left Agypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference between the opinions of Eufebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Flood, then the rest) I reckon the times which come between these Floods in this sort. The generall Flood was in the yeere of the World 1616. Jacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Jacobs birth, there were consumed 553. yeeres. Ogyges Flood happened 100. yeeres after Jacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Flood 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the World 2316. and had liued 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Theffalia was overwelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Flood was after Noahs Flood ended, 782. yeeres. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres between the generall Flood and Deucalions birth; to which add 32. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Theffalia followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEUCALIONIS, secundo anno SPHAEKII, septingentis suppartienti anni, qui natus anno duos & octoginta Theffaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of DEUCALION, in the second yeeres of SEHARRYS, are numbred 700. yeeres, and when DEVALGION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Treballia drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter timeabout Parnassus witnesseth driftstoe in the fir of his Metecors. And Parro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of Deucaligion to have happened in the time of Cranau, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinks it somewhat later, Amphytrion reigning in Athen, the third from Cecrops. Onely this of Deucaligion was very great, and reached not onely ouer Treballie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward, but it couered the greatest part of Italie: and eyther the same, or some other particular Flood: then happening, opprest Egypt, sayth Eusebius.

10 And therefore did the Greekes either thinke it, or faine it to be vniuersall; and Educati then King, fauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, sayth Solinus) was by reason thereof, (as Strabo witnesseth) sayd to be the preseruer of Mankind. That this Floud couered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable, who affirme, that the people then inhabiting Italie, were therefore called Sabini: quia ab imbribus diluuij superfluent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Plinius in his second: which Plinius these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Bruthi, and all others inhabiting Anciently the banks of the Mediserranean Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters

20 of Italie before the Flood of Noah, and so tooke name by firing themselves vpon the Appennine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs; shewing what and who onely then were preferred: which is sufficient. Report hath aduentured further, tellings vs, that the first people which after the generall Flood inhabited Italie, were the Camei; (so named from Camei, whom Cato in originibus, another of Annius his Authors, names for a consort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a fuaige life; till such time as Saturne arriving on those Coasts, deuised Lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos & afius and Varro among the Latines haue preferred; and of whom Virgil:

30 *Primus ab aethereo venit SATVRNVS, Olympo,

Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus alis
Composuit, Legesq; dedit; Latiumq; vocari

Fearing the Armes of IVPITER his Sonne,
His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence, doth flie.

To liue together, and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latum.

40 And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Aufones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which againe sought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venero Sicani,
Then came th' Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sciani (which left Spain, and sat downe in Italie) Thucydes and Plinie give testimony: who were againe expelled by the Ligij, saith Thucydes. After all these plantations and replantations came the Embri, descended of the Gauls (saith Annius) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, even all

30 Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionysius have allured vs: and therefore this Flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossest of Italie again before the Vmbri were ever heard of; for had being came the Pelagi, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his sixt, speaks at large: and after them the Lydi, vnder Tyrrenus their Captaine, that gaue name to the Tyrreni; who casting thence the Vmbri, tooke from them three hundred Cattles, and built therein twelue Cities; to which (after they had posselt and past ouer the Apennine Mountaines) they added diuers others, whercof Telphin (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Vmbri, in those parts, I doe not affirme; hauing respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinkes, that the name was deriued from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these Vmbri of Italie were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter. 10

§. IIII.

Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

E Aint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the Vniuersall Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembered) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But 20 as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine Letters was not receiued, finde no Parent of more antiquitie, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigene, and growing out of the Earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heere-say, that some Giants saued themselves vpon the Mountaines Baris in Armenia, but speake not thereof as from any authentic 30 approved: vntill the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembereth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth, that Sisithrus, to preferre himselfe from a Flood fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian uanigio confregit: bat: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which hee also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were couered with mudd and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs Flood.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Flood. And Plato in Timeo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the Flood vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long 40 before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembereth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges, Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Delochus King of the Affrians, though I doe not beleue him as touching the time. But this Flood couered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Pulture on Prometheus his Liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these words: *Fluuium propter cursum velocitatem, profunditatemq; aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, Herculem cum consilijs magnitudine, tum virtute, valent et vestigio compressisse, et aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum conuersisse: Vnde et Graci quidam Poeta rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, Herculem tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI iecur depascienti occidisse; This Flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those 50 dayes called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great iudgement and vertue did againe compress and straighten this Riuer, so farre extended and over-spred, turning it into the old channels: Whence certaine Greeke Poets (conuerting this labour and worke of Hercules into a fable)* fable) denis'd, that Hercules slew the Eagle which sed on Prometheus Liuer; meaning that he deliuered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrey (by the Waters destroyed and couered ouer) he suffered.

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiue out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe fort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuisse: prima nouimeisris inundatio terrarum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith this same Xenophon): the first, which was vniuersall, of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules 10 and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two Moneths, vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths, in Thessalia, vnder Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proetus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the *Samothrac*es for his Authors, remembereth a Flood in Asia the lesse, and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction then any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellepont breaking in ouer the Land.

But there haue been many Floods in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembered, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same yeere, Gregorie then being Bilhop of Rome, there happened a marvellous ouerflowing in Italie, and especially in the Venetian Territorie; and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vpon and left vpon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Tristhemius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that, of a Flood in Frisland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozus Segog, in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander 30 the sixt: also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembereth a perillous ouer-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginius a French Historian speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Iudgement Day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Nismes there were removed diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Silver and Gold, diuers peeces of Plate, and Vessels of other Metall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Prouince, in the yeere 1156.

§. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue bene fore-seene by the Starres.

NOW howsoeuer all these Floods, and many other, which haue couered at severall times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southfayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall Flood (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the Earth by a power aboue Nature, and by the especial 50 commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres and abundance to the Fontaines of the Deepe: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of Nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever vnion could performe, without receiuing from the Fontaine of all power strength, and faculties supernaturall. Hiericus Mechliniensis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Alba Major obserueth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watric Signe, and the House of the Atlaone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moysfure, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Flood by diuine reuelation, yet (this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signes, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by * Cataclysmos Calis (Englified the Windores of Heauen) Moses meant this great and watric conjunction; the word (Cataclysmos) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith Petrus de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordeane by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake 10 those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood, that the words Cataclysmos Calis, or Windores of Heauen, were to be taken for the former conjunction, or for these watric Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Atlaone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebraeorum Cataclysmos Calis vocasse, nisi partes illas Calis, quae generatim sunt pluarum et inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aequatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Cataclysmos Calis, or Windores of Heauen) unless he thereby vnderstand those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendred the Raine, and 20 Inundations of Waters, such as are the watric Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable Wisdom this conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gaue to euery operation encrease of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaynes, commanding them to call out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoeuer else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

§. VII.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the vniuersall Flood: And what are Cataclysmos Calis,

Gen. 7. Vers. 11.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which is granted, it may seeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable World fiftene Cubits aboue the highest Mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so retrayned himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to ouer-couer the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels 40 of the Earth; and all whatsoeuer was dispersit therein, pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had aboue one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles: Take then the highest Mountaine of the World, Canasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaines of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tenniser; and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth aboue thirte miles vpright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the space of thirte miles in height, this thirte miles vpright being found in the depths of the Earth 50 one hundred and fixtene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up, and the waters drawe out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre ouer and aboue it, wee shall finde the difference exceeding great: If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre, as euery where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conuersion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly,

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aluacensis, to which I may adde Berossus and others, That such a conjunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Cataclysmos Calis, or Windores of Heauen, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other answer then that obseruation of Ludovicus Pius, who affirmeth, That by the grauest Astrologian it was obserued, that in the yeere 1524, there should happen the like conjunction as at Noahs Flood; then which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seasonable yeere: the like destruction was prophesied of the yeere 1588. But Petrus Earle of Mirandula proueth, that there could not be any such conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Cataclysmos Calis, then that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For whosoever hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts, (where clouds doe not breake into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly vnderstand that manner of speech which Moses did; that the Windores or Flood-gates of Heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell contrary to custome, and that order which wee call naturall. God then loosened the power retentive in the vppermost ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith 10 Job. 12. 9, 10, 11) he which holdeth the Waters, and they drie up; or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dried up; but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the Waters in the Clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the general Flood, and called vp the Waters which slept in the great Deepe; and these ioyning together, couered the Earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast Caves, and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops.

§. VII.

Of some remainder of the memorie of Noah among the Heathen.

NOA H commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entered the Arke which he had built, with his owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wiues, taking with them of euery Creature which took life by generation, (euery of the cleane, and of the vncleane, two: Noah, according to Pseudo Philo, signifieth quietnesse: after others, and according to the prophetic of his Father Lamech, callation; to whom after-times gaue many Names, answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Flood of Achaia, Saturne they called him; because he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the Name of Deucalione, who was said to heale away Iapetus fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others 40 thinke, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the Name of Ianus, (id est) vinosus, because Ianus signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian findes him written in Liberis Ritualibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Frugus, and Ioue: which thirte enjoyed an elder time then all the other ancientest fained gods. And this Name Ianus is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vfe before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pictor gueth this testimony: *IANI erat nulla erat monarchia; quia mortalibus veteribus nondum hiserat villa regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populus docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primum enim, &c. Pomaria & saccharum, in the time of Ianus (saith he) there was no Monarchy; for the first of rule had not then: first he was the beards of men. Ianus first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Decore: he first set up Altars, instituted Games, dedicated solitary Oratories; wherein they used to pray, with other holy Rites and Ceremonies: Agrements testimonies then this thope cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all 50 agrests, so well with the Scriptures: For first whilst Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarchy: Nimrod being the first that tooke on him his soveraigne authority. Secondly, Noah being the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the first-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that offered an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God, a thanksgiving for* for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Ianus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Flood. Quia prateritis nouerit, & futura profpexerit, saith A. N. O. B. I. V. S. because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Ianus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The Seed of the World: because as out of that confused Heape were drawne all the kinds of Beasts and Plants, so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ouid in the person of Ianus:

Me Chaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant, Aspice quàm longi temporis acta cano.

The ancient call'd me Chaos: my great yeares
By those old times, of which I sing, appeares.

He was also intitled Caelum and Sol, Heaven and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphroditus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greekes called Liber γυν, and his Nurfes Hyades, of Rayne, because Noah entred the Arke when the Sunne ioynd with the Starrs Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and euer after a Monument of Noahs Flood. He was also by others furnamed Triton, a Marine god, the Sonne of Neptune; because he liued in safetie on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name of Dionysus, quasi diuinus, mentem pungens, Bite-braine, or Wit-singer; though Diodorus 20 conceiue otherwise, and deriue that name à pater & loco, Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Nysa, a Towne of Arabia felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. Hee had also the by-name of Taurus, or Tauraphagus; because hee first yoked Oxen, and tyllid the ground: according to that of Moses, And Noah became an Husbandman. Now howfoeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolne from Noah. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Boëcus, was taken (saith Gal. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables deuised, of 30 which Diodorus complayneth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was furnamed Nysus, of the Mountaine Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoever themselves saie of his enterprises: and these Mountaines of Nysa ioyne with those of Parapanisus, and those other Easterne Mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserued, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Riuer and Mountaines; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many Names giuen him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah vpon the banks of 40 the red Sea, and elsewhere: the Riuer of Noah in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolemy, Danubius; diuiding Myria from Pannia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made,
the matter, fashion, and name.

NOW in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the Scriptures, neyther doe I finde any approved Author that hath written thereof: onely Genapius Becanus in his Index Scylacius conceiue, that Noah built his Arke neere the Mountaines of Caucasus, because on those Hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre among a people, called Nysai, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar: To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God, and Nabucodonosor also, because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which also he addeth the conueniencie of Riuer, to transport the Timber which he needed, without troubling any other Carriages. Only

Only this we are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World; and so my vnderstanding, not farre from the place where it rested after the Flood. For Noah did not vfe any Malt or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue, then the Hulke or Body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to passe vpon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible Winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundam planum, a flat bottom, and not rayed in forme of a Ship, with a sharpenesse forward, to cut the waues, for the better speed.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Decubitus Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes he arriued, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinks that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inuenter of Auguration.

Pencerus findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinks it 20 deriued from the Hebrew word Nahas, which signifieth Auguration and Dination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Lease before cited.

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lyeth the difference betwene Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth and beareth it safe vpon the Waters.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship in this, that it had a Coouer and Roofe, with a Crest in the middelt thereof, and the sides declining like the Roofe of an House; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomenesse of the 30 many Beasts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vfed, is diuersly vnderstood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneua Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbins, Cedar; the Seuentic, Square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will haue it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worne at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it 40 was the vfe to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes eate not; and he auoweth, that he saw in Nica, in the Temple of Apollo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kind of wood was not subiect to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete fauour, lasting also better then any other wood, & because neere the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedars trees, as also in all the mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Pencerus conceiue, that the Arke had diuers sorts of Timber, and that the bottom had of one sort, the decke and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines: thereby to seuer the cleane beasts from the vnclane, and to preserve their seuerall sorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, hee cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without without the helpe of a Compass, or the North starre. The Pitch which Nash used, is by some supposed to haue beene a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea, or Asphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitee.

De Civit. Dei,
lib. 1. c. 26.

The Arke, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cubites, sixtie of bredth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion, it had fixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie, que sit salua per signum, in quo pendit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Iesus: nam & mensura ista longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinis, eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines pronuntiatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (sayth he) it is a figure of the Citie of God, travelling in this World as a stranger (that is) of the Church, suied by the Tree whereupon the Mediator betwene God and Man, the Man Iesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height, and bredth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

By what kind of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath beene a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palme-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Person Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three ynches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth fixe common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mensures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length then it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost fixe of the Common: For measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacitee of that Vessell built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomie Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, vpon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preferue all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their owne element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca que possent in aquis vivere, non solum mrisa sicut Pisces, verum super-nantia, sicut multa alies: It was not needfull to conserve those Creatures in the Arke, which could live in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can live vnder water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia Adam non huius, sed illius fructum victum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters, which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did Adam eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

Dei, lib. 8. c. 27.

And if we looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, we shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischief and of ignorance, then of any reuerend reason, finde many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of severall kindes, were not then in verum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, cyther they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyans, and the like; the one begotten by Asses and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discovering of strange Lands, wherein there are found diuers Beasts and Birds differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficiall consideration, that all those which weare red and pyed Skins, or Feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and were plaine russet or blacke; they are much mistaken that so thinke. And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but onely in magnitude, betwene the Cat of Europe, and the Owne of India; and even those Dogges which are become wilde in Hispagniola, with which the Spaniards vsed to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Castell, and doe also oftentimes teare asunder their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the down'd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which wee call the Blacke-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, then the people of this part of the World. We also see it dayly, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the best Melons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcummers, by being set in a barren Soyle. Therefore taking the kindes precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contayne of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly stature (and lesse allowance we cannot giue to the difference betwene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 400. foot in length; and 100. foot in bredth, and 60. foot deepe.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not vsed in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Os, King of Babylon, had beene nine Geometrical Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if these Cubites had beene Geometrical, then had beene 54. foot in height, and vpwads, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath beene nine foot long, and farre waighier and bigger then all Davids bodie, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had beene vsed for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters haue obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe fixe Cubites of length, sixe of bredth, and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot vpright, and so must their Priests haue ascended by steps or Ladders to haue performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement, given in these words: Thou shalt not goe up with steppes vnto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discouered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubites high, which make foure foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinary Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doublelesse) might giue much the more capacitee to the Arke, although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the Horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quiquities be contained in a Vessell of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsuall measure: whence it followeth of necessitie, that those large Bodies which were in the dayes of Nash might haue room sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saved, (that is) seven of the cleane, two of the vncleane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, Butoo hath very learlearnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie Cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubits, sheweth the whole Concauitie to haue bene 450000. Now whereas the polls, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the rooffe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cubicall Cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatnesse we seeke roome for 89. distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. severall kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne; the Beefe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeces, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the Law of Moses, whereof feuen of a kind entred into the Arke, namely, three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kindes were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great Beasts cleane, and six and fiftie vn cleane, estimable for largenesse as ninetie one Beeces; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as a hundred and twentie Beeces. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke fixe and twentie kindes, estimable with good allowance for supply, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which deuoure flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to three score and foure Wolves. All these two hundred and eightie Beasts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke, in their severall Cabbinnes; their Meat in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries.

That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betwene the East Indies, and Scythia.

†. I.

A preterition of some questions less materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHat time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to dispute: but he receiued the Commandement from God a hundred yeeres before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leysure sufficient. As for the number of Deekes and Partitions, which Origen diuides into foure, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuersie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegatois) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this sayth Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-pool might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Cry stall to receiue in Light, and keepe out Water, were but to reuiue the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is in what part of the World the Arke rested after the Flood: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the terrestriall Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all storie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the Hills of Armenia.

ANd first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah traualled to their first settlement and plan-plantation, I am resolu'd (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were vterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my Humour or newnesse of opinion, or singularity; but doe herein ground my selfe on the original and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke, sited vpon one of the mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordai in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordai and Kardu, seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion into the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit:) that it rested ah 10 that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Annianus (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembereth a Promontorie in Arabia Felix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Ptolomie calls Ociliis, Pinctus Aeyls, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annianus, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Gordai, and 20 Curtius Cordai: Ptolomie Gordai and Gordixi: of which the Countie next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Arax: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordius or Gordoni. The mountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plains of Armenia the great, nere the Lake Thosphis: whence the Riuer of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordai (that which surmounteth the rest)

30 Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus; which name (saith Iunius) was of the euent; because of Noahs coming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed euent; seeing any hill, from whence on euery side we must descend, may thus be called: as Iunius corrects the place in Iosephus anabazis (Kubaris). That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Iosephus l. 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called anabazis (as it were the descent or coming downe) and Epiphanius l. 1. contr. Heref. calls it anabazis: which word is in the Armenian and 40 gyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to be deriued; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath bene embraced from age to age, receiuing a habit of strength by time; and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the rest adioyning.

†. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

BUT there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordian mountaines.

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus; that it was in the 130. yeece, or in the yeece 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the world of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chulb, and Chaldea. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue spent so many yeeres in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely intertend; which might by easie iourneies haue bene past out in twentie dayes; and to hasten and helpe which passage the nauigable riuer of Tigris offered itselfe, which is euerie where transpassable by boates of great burden: so as where the Desert on the one side resisted their expedition, the riuer on the contrary side serued to aduance it: the riuer rising out of the same Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surpise of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it foundeth ill to the care of reason, that they would haue spent many yeeres in that low and ouerflowne Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Riueres which imbroyder or compasse it: for the effects witnessed their affections; and the workes, which they vnderooke, their vnbeliefe; being no sooner arriued in Shinar, but they began to prouide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the first known Citie of the world founded after the flood, about 131. yeeres, or (as others suppose) ten yeeres later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they vnderooke that worke in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, To get vs a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vsurpe dominion ouer the rest.

Gen. 10. 10.

†. IIII.

The second argument, That the Easterne people were most ancient in populositie, and in all humane glory.

For a second Argument: The ciuillie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight then any thing which hath bene, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vse of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade vs, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, makes vs now to vnderstand, That the place of Philoftratus in vita Apollonij Tiani. l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell betwixen Hypofis and Ganges, vse not themselves to goe forth into battaile: but that they drive away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Iupiter: By which meanes there it is said, that Hercules Aegyptus and Bacchus; ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield: For the inuention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because hee brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to giue him the honour, from whence they receiued the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no lesse ancient then Seth or Enoch were: for they are said to haue written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Easterne world it was that Iohn Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gersona Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this mysterie was then supposed to be but newly borne, the Chinats had letters long before either the Aegyptians or Phoenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnessed, who about an hundred yeeres since discovered those Kingdomes, and doe now enioy their rich trades therein: for the Chinats account all other Nations but Saluages, in respect of themselves.

And to adde strength to this argument the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may iustly be called to witness, who found more Cities and sumptuosities in that little Kingdome of Perse, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other trauals & vndertakings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not trauielled so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Countrey, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farr as the Sub-rising, and heare Paulus Venetus what hee reporteth of the vtermost Angle and Iland thereof, wee shall finde that those Nations haue sent out, and not receiued, their knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more salvage.

And

And of the Ile of Iapan (now Zippingari) Venetius maketh this report: Incola religioni, literis, & sapientia sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacra in delubris exerceant: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant, The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they vse in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuillie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernment, is reported to be such by those who haue bene employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and denoted by other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMI RAMIS found in the East Indies.

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader: who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more then three Millions to invade India, to which hee adioyned also 500000. Horse, and 100000. Waggon: whereof if wee beleeue but a third part, it shall suffice to proue that India was the first planted and peopled Countrey after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein shee liued: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betwixen Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whom shee encountered in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod. Siculus. STAVROBATES, autis maioribus quam que erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs. STAVROBATES gathering together greater troups then those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had bene encreased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance (this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Staurobates must haue bene made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow vp in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication naturall, produce so many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Armie victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had bene so late as Babel ouerturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65. yeeres time after the flood, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cush ere hee begat Seba, after whom hee had Hauilah, Sabrah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: Cush ere hee begat Seba, and then thirte yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Seba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and fise yeeres to his fise elder brothers, which make sixtie fise, and then twice thirte yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Seba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all an hundred twenty fise yeeres, there will then remaine 50 fise yeeres to haue bene spent in trauieling from the East, ere they arriued in Shinar in the yeere after the flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might bee of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to haue arriued at Shinar in the yeere 101: and the confusion to haue bene at *Peleg*s birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build *Nimrod*s Towre in the Ayre; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require found foundations) in the Plains of Shinaar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that yeere 101. or at *Peleg*s birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vsurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere after tione, fol. 173.

after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted forty yeeres (according to GLI CAS) Hominibus in ea perficienda totū 40. annis incassum laborantibus, Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Flood, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly be beleued, that Strabon could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperesse of all that part of the world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument from diuers considerations in the persons of Noah.

Fourthly, it is no way propable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had liued therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the flood, without any certaine habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne world; (which traualles Noah put ouer to yong and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then couered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range ouer so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where hee should (if the tradition be found) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spain, where they lay he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his sonnes wiues: from thence into Italie, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Sauour of Aegypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they say hee banisht him out of Italie. These be but the fancies of Berosus Anianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcian fables. For let euery reasonable man conceiue, what it was to traualle firre in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flood, the same lay waste and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bulhes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spain: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue undertaken that vnbeleueing presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preuent perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authority which hee receiued euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoeuer they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority ouer his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through crueltye and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probabilitye, that euer he came so firre West as Babylon; but rather, that hee sent those numbers which came into Shinar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Naclerus and Calestius take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Istlan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Istlan of Sem, and Suphene of Saphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I wil not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Istlan, Hanilah, and Ophir, are especially noored to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning adioyning to Indus; and held also a part of Chaldaa for a time: for Abraham inhabited Yr, till hee was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Istlan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moues me to beleue, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested apart with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where he planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thankes-giuing to God by sacrifice, he is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

†. VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor vpon BEROSUS: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested, as the Caspian and Cordian hills which are three hundred miles asunder, and also some place of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments & authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruallously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Cassys which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Cordiaz, hee hath no other shift to vnitethese opinions, but by vnitethese farre-distant mountaines together. To effect which, he hath found no other inuention, then to charge those men with error, which are carelessly ouerseen, printed, and published Prolimies Geographie, in which they are altogether disseuered. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills fife degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanouanus and others, we shall finde nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in those the mountaines Cassys stand seuen degrees to the East of the Cordiaz, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authority Annius strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giueth this iudgment vpon them in the like dispute. Aberrant vno omnes, non negligentia sed ignorantia sitis ignorantia, They haue all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to proue the same hee citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeeres before Ninus, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia the stocke of mortall men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembered (who were so called, because sined from Deucalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse IANVM cum DRYM & Gallis progenitoribus Vmbrorum, From these Scythians, he saith, that IANVS came with DRYM and with the Galli the progenitors of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythia tribuitur, Certainly, so the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway giuento the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Vmbri which long since inhabited Italie, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he saith a nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part

(to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood, 250. yeares before Armenia) and in part utterly destroyed his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga mankind was restored, he therefore in the Prologue of his Commentarie ypon Berosus, leaue out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia saluatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca, is undoubtedly vnder the Mountaynes of Euphrasius, on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground; and from thence last parts (according to Aristotle) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinar or Babylonia.

But now the best authoritie which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where hee hath 10 read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name of Scythia Rege eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) wee may see his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his fallhood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author beginning in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythae, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this title to that very Chapter. Scythiarum origo & successus, fabula, The original and success of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomee doth directly delineate Scythia Saga or Saca, and sets them in 30. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Heraclitus) call all the Scythians, a Saca which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that 20 name. Now that any nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleueth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Countrie about Araxes Ptolomee calleth Colchene and Soducene and Sacapene without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100. severall Nations are by Ptolomee precisely set downe.

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some haue written, others haue scene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountaines is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea est, quae proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdians, Margians, usque ostia Oxannu in Ilyrcanum mare excurrentis: & parte ipsius mari hinc usque ad Rhumini ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus is that part of the World, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaean Mountaines: on the North by unknowne Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are the Saccæ) the Sogdians, and the Margians, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Ilyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que magna sunt Regia est, & quæ immensas nationes complectitur) Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations (saith Niger) much of it being betwene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, hee disseuereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leaue on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Fencius, hee hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nations; neyther doth his fellow Frier Iohn Plancarpio (cited by Vincencius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neyther doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the blood of those Kings (though afterward a Monke) euer acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Mathias a Michon (a Canon of Cracouia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that trauielled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Trauailes are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as hee hath done: prouing and disproving many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others hee buieth that ancient received opinion; That out of the Mountaines Riphei, and Hyperborei, in Scythia, spring the Riuer of Tanaus or Don, Volga or Edel; prouing by vnauerable experience, that there are no such Mountaines in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountaines of those famous Riueres are now by the Trade of Muscouia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marish grounds. The Riuer of Tanaus or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Iuanowfero, in the great Wood Okenizkites or Isophanatics. Volga, which Ptolomee calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Podkonski: from which Lake the two other famous Riueres flow of Riphenes (now Neyer) and Dsuina or Dniudna. And this learned Polonian doth in this 10 fort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Rustians, Lithuanians, Muscouians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Vissa, thuanians, Muscouians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Vissa, and the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia: and for the East border he nameth Tanaus or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same Riuer of Tanaus, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomee calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the same Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe about three hundred and a few odde 20 yeeres before his owne time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem nouam, & aduentum à paribus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this: a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, and gat new states a little more then 300. yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Gothes or Pendur inhabited Sarmatia, Asiatica. And this Mathias liued in the yeare 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeare 1506. as Hucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested; and the Scythia Saca were those people which liued at the North foot of those Mountaines of Tanaus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe 30 themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony then the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomee, it is plaine, that betwene all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not one the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariace) betwene Taxartus and Iactus, but what are these Scythians to any Ariace, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

¶ VIII.

The fift Argument, The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we adde the considération of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall finde that the fruit of the Vine or Rayn did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countreies thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Syrphus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such as Brennus and the Gauls inuaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camius) the Gauls remained betwene the Pyrenei and the Alpes, neere vnto the 50 Senones, where the continued along time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they hasted to inhabit that Countrey, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturnus from elle where into Italie.

Now it is manifest, that Noah trauielled not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing hee did, was, to till the ground, and to planta Vineyard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiuing to God; and wherefoeuer the Arke rested, there

there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare, that he tra-uailed farre: for the Scriptures reach vs, that he was a Husbandman, & not a Wanderer.

† I. X.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole earth.

And that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appeare, saying that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written:
So that the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they haue this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem adificauerunt, alij simam, quasi per eam caelum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens,

† X.

Answere to the obiection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

But before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldaean Paraphrast calls it Kardus; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenians selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sate thereon.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Moun-taines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Moun-taine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncouered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, wee might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke layed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seat of these Mountaines, and to prouoe them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Caenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description the maketh mention of Marjay, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Maander, which is farre from the Gordic Mountains in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Iosephus (though out of Berossus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Iosephus sets Ararat after Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the prouince of Caron by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunte that they had in those dayes referred some pieces of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betwene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discouerie of the Mountaines Cordia is first borrowed out of Berossus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berossus, differs far from the wordes of that Berossus, which wandreth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Anniius. For Berossus cited by Iosephus, hath these words: Fertur & nauigij huius pars in Armenia apud montem Cordiae aequum superesse, & quosdam bitumen inde abrafum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci huius homines vti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia vpon the Cordic Mountains; and that diuers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they vse it in stead of an amulet. But Anniius his

Edition

Edition of the Fragment of Berossus vseth these wordes: Nam eleuata ab aquis in Gordia montis vertice quiescit, cuiusdam dicitur aliquam partem esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen collere quo maxime vtiuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordic Mountains, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diuersly written. The ancient Berossus writes Cordia with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordia with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preseruatiue against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice; And if it be said that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approued Anthour: for one of them vseth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, thaiso it is sayd; and both but by heate-fay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these Mountaines which Ptolomie calls Gordia, are not those Moun-taines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Moschici. These be his owne wordes: Montes Armenia nominantur ij, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur vsq; ad superiacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryardes; which Mountaines Plinie calleth Pariedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordia or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordic Mountains in 39. and a halfe: from the Northernmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountaines of Gordia, otherwise Baris Karad or Lubar, (which Ptolomie calleth Torgodasion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

† XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills then the Armenian.

For the best Cosmographers with other, that haue scene the Mountaines of Armenia find them farre inferiour, and vnder-set to diuers other Mountaines euen in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountaine Athos betwene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomie calls Olympus, now called Lucas, (saith Castaldus) is farre surmounting any Mountaine that euer hath beene scene in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seuen and thirtie miles and vpwards: of which Plutarch: Athos adumbrat latera Lemnia bonis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Windes, Cloudes or Raie ouertopit. Againe, the Mountaine of Amandrus in Mysia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may be scene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which Herodotus: Exstat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis effe dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculis mortalium peruenire non possint: Upon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose height is sayd to be such, as the eye of no mortall man can discern the top thereof.
And if we may beleue Aristotle, then are all these inferiour to Caucasus, which he ma-keth the most notorious both for breath and height: *Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui aequum ad ortum sunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cuius iuga a Sole radiantur vsq; ad con-tincium ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu: Caucasus (saith Aristotle) is the greatest Moun-taine both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sun-beames, vsq; ad contincium (which is saith Macrobius) betwene the first crowing after mid-night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleue eyther:
for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Teneriffe in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes company at any such late hours. Besides these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasus, are those which separate Colebiu from Iberia,*

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for hee acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phasis riseth in the same Mountayne, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which lynder Colchis from Iberia, falling after ward into Euxinus: which Riuer (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities if in this Storiewe should take Ararat for Armenia.

So as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Sybilis set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the elevation and supposition haue equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (sayth Hierome) signifieth high Towres: and so may all high Hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better giue the name of Baris to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselves doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiaz stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiazan, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is feared nere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hills which diuoyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaile that the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and euen in India be called Ararat.

Lastly, we must blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else we must digge it downe, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Shinar: or else we shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to euery eye, we must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian; but as these being continuations of many Hills keepe one name in diuers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Coatrus, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hircania, Armenia, Coraxia, Caspia, Moschici, Amazomici, Hemiochi, Seythici, (thus diuersly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie calls by one name Caucasus, lying betwene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which run afunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those maruailous Mountaines of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of seuerall names giuen by Ptolomie was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disieuer; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Parapanisus: hauing

uing all these Kingdomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles, as they feuer and diuide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which sunder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the lesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Prouince of Syria) are called Armanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Though Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates forceth her passage, leauing the name of Armanus to the mountaines on her West banke; and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the Riuer of Tigris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatrus, though betwene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus out of the Southerne part whereof the Riuer of Euphrates riseth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the Riuer Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now nere their wayes end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Parapanisus, and lastly of Caucasus, euen were the famous Riuer of Indus with his principall companions Hydaspes and Zaradrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselves exceeding high, to equall the strong Hills called Imaus of Seythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanquer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomie), that is, betwene Parapanisus and Imaus: and improperly, betwene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

†. XIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile

Now in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and Riuer Imaus, and the Mountaine Nysus (so called of Bacchus Nysus or Nosh) are found: and on these highest Mountaines of that part of the world did Coropius Eecanus conceiue that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Flood: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approued. In his Indo-scythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantasticall opinions of this subiect. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude are the most delicate Vines of the World, namely, in Iudaea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these Mountaines, Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land by Moses direction found bunches of equal bignes at Escol. The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana nere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate Vine of all other.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

And therefore to conculde this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also traueise Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name

name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high Hills, euen from Cilicia to Paropamisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betwene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gaue them; the diuersitie of appellations no otherwise growing, then by their diuiding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran, and inland Seas; and yet where it walseth the Coasts of Carthage, and ouer against it, it is called Tyrrhenus: betwene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: betwene Athens and Asia, Egeum: betwene Sessus and Abydus, Hellepont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Denealedonycum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, euen to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction then the words beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plaine (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconuenience or contrarietie) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selues any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolue our selues, that euery word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Booke. And therefore wee must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of CHRIST IESVS (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narratibus Discipulis Christi) in Euangelio legerit, quam si ipsam uanum Dei, quam in proprio in corpore gestabat, conpexerit; That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which he readeth in the Gospell (the Disciples of Christ hauing written it) then if he had seene the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his owne body, setting it downe.

The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which prouoeth without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For wee must remember, that in all places where soeuer Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Iofan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after hee departed from Sechem, hee vseth these wordes: Afterward, remoouing thence vnto a Mountaine Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents; hauing Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written. And ABRAHAM went forth iourneying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophecied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that she came from the South to visit SALOMON: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents vnto Christ. And that all Regions, and these trauailes were precisely set downe vpon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Iudea, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Calefyrians the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arriue in that Vally of Babylonia, is not a iourneying from the East, nor so neere vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto caelo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrionall, and the North part thereof in forty five; and those Gordiean Mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are situated in thirtie five, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betwene East and West) the Gordiean Mountaines stand in 75. degrees, and the the Valley of Shinaar in 79 and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar North-west, ninetie five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compasse. But Gregorie and Nicrome warne vs, In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabe, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for euery speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Atos teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleue Writers (of little authority) who also speake by heare say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolas Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all aduenture. But this is infallible true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the floud; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, which had Noah himselfe for an Instructor: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which ouertopped in number those Millions of Semiramus, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Atos the Mountaines of Ararat, and not on those Mountaines of the Northwest, as Berosus first shined, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, where hee planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground and liued thereon. Placuit vero NOACHO agricultura studium, in quadratantia ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eam rem sua ipsius lingua LETH-ADAMATHI (hoc est) telluris uir appellatur cel-bratusque est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOACH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that NOACH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that he was no Wanderer: and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preferue him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the floud; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was reseeded.

§. I.

Whether SEM and HAM were elder then IAPHET.

IF these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the yongest: and herein the oppinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery where in the Scriptures, and especially in Atos, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeres, but in vertue, as by the examples of Henoah, Abraham, Jacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneua, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these wordes: Puto SEM alio the Father of all the Sonnes of HEMER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SEM alio the Father of all the Sons of HEMER, and brother of IAPHET, the eldest sonne were children borne. So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it bene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconuenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the sixe hundred yeere of his life, begate the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the sixe hundred yeere (to wit) the hundredth yeere following, came the generall flood; two yeeres after which Shem begate Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeeres old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeeres old at the flood, and in the sixe hundredth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This younger sonne so conuerted by the vulgar and Genea, Iunius turnes it filius minimus; His youngest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to bee the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminence of his birth, as Esaue and Reuben did. Peterius conceiue that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparatiue degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Sauour were defended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Genea, who agree in this conuersion, Shem Frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremelius, Shem fratri IAPHET maioris; or with Peterius, Shem frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Peterius qualieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the flood did not agree with the elderhip (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred yeeres old, and begat Arphaxad two yeeres after the flood; and againe in the 12. Verse: So Shela lived after he begat Eber, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of five yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres were alwaies precisely accounted.

of diuers things that all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of Ham.

BUT let vs go vnto the Worlds plantation after the flood, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many Nations haue supposed or fained themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receiue allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoeuer, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath bene been borrowed thence, and therefore latter then it, as all carefull obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Frame of his Chronologie: Moses is found more ancient then all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Traian warre; and farre before HERCULES, MUSÆVS, LITHON, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLUX, ÆSCULAPIVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophetes: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greeces haue seated in the top and highest Turrets of their Diuinitie.

For of the three Iaphets remembred by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Aether, Cicero de Nat. Deorum 1. 3. whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Aegypt: Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Aegypto nouissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensis Regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Aegypt, in the last dayes of Cecrops, King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it selfe, but T Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuersly prooued, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut asunder the purpose in hand, by alleging many authorities in an needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place.

The Sonnes of IAPHET were,

30 The Sonnes of IAPHET were,	{ Gomer, Magog, Madai, Iauan, Tubal, Mesbach, and Tirah. }	The Sonnes of GOMER were, { Askenaz, Riphath, Gogorma.
		The Sonnes of IAVAN were, { Elisha, Tarshis, Kittim, and Dedanim.

First, we are to consider, that the world after the Flood not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinaar, to the vtermost border of Europe, Africa and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wife Father, who knew those parts of the world before the Flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as Discoverers, or at all aduention, but assigned and allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Auentours, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Æneus) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build heerein vpon the Scriptures themselves, and after them vpon Reason and Nature. First therefore wee must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euery-where had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfull Vallies, with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our selues thereby, what wonderfull Deserts, what impassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens, and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaines) was pestered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depreffeth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect) yet in twenty or thirtie yeeres, these our grounds would not all ouer-grow and be couered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods, or with other offensiue Thickets and Bushments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long & warme Summer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeeres, to raise themselves without contollement.

This being considered, it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whom Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People, disperic themselves into the Regions adioyning to the said Vallie of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldaa; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first posselt; yet could he not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the fuddaine, but by time and degrees. For wee finde, that Abraham the true succellour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Me; and from thence (called by God) hee rested at Charran in Assyria: from whence after the death of Thare hee trauid to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neyther of themselves) seven Descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea, where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeares; and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Ninive. Indeede the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can know) were, in that Age of the Issues of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking lesse effect, vntill diuers yeares were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many Descents together.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in IAPHET'S portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie seating GOMER the sonne of IAPHET in Italie; and another of IAPHET'S sonnes TUBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

IO beginne therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Iles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iapheth sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the diuision were made at Phaleg's birth) in the yeare of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeare after the Flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iapheth were the Iles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands: adioyning; and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellefpon and Aegeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut is off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Iles lying betweene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Iles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young-ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which hee held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dixit Deus IAPHETH; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posteritie of) IAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of SHEM. For though Iunius heere vseth the word (alliciat) and not dilatet and the Genua persuadeat; yet the Septuagint haue dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his Seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iapheth sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if wee may beleuee Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth yeare of Nimrod's Reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which also Furnius confirmeth in these words Anno decimo NIMROD, &c. In the tenth yeare of NIMROD'S Reigne, GOMERVS GALLVS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeare of the same NIMROD'S Reigne TUBAL seated himselfe in Austuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeares after the Flood; according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Furnius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the height and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre was almost builded the Scriptures witness: Bu

the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Towre, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Bricke to such a Worke, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was. For where the vniuersall Flood covered the highest Mountaines fiftene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Towre (saith NIMROD) whose top may reach vnto the Heauen: meaning, that they would rayse their Worke aboute fiftene Cubits higher then the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with Waters of all the World: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approued also by the Prophet Hieremie; speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a rayed building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycer vpon Genesis giueth fortie yeares. For it seemeth, that the Towre was neere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may bee gathered (because the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Worke of their supposed defence, which was the Towre: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to bee noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Towre was throwne downe) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newnesse of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeares; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeare could creep through 3000. miles of Desart, with Women, Children, and Cattell: let those light Beleuers, that neyther tie themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approue it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeares in building, or but neere such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. yeares, it were more then foolishnesse and madnesse it selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrivall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeares, and whereof they had spent some part in trauielling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Worke 400. yeares (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Towre of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeares remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wiues and Children, and Cattell, to trauaile 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Desarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeares then of a 100. dayes. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they haue not entered the Countrey ten miles in ten yeares. And if Nimrod's people spent many yeares by the account before remembered in passing from the East India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance betweene those places containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Biscay is much more; for the bodie of Biscay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Austuria or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke diuers yeares to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little about 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many yeares to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles to Countreies lesse knowne vnto them by farre; then the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what hee understood of most part of the World else it is vnknowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth & twelfth of Nimrod's rods Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at one? But it may be objected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea, and so save this great traivale through Defarts by Land. But we neuer reade of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people as we may iustly suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily beleue, that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattell, by whose Milke they liued and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banquetting Dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Heards and numbers of their Cattell: who had Flockes of Sheepe, and great Droues and Heards of their owne, and their own Sheep-herds and Heardsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouergone Granado, Valentia, and other Provinces in that Traff: past the Streights of Gibraltar, disdayned all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and haue fought out the yron, woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Hispania) by along and dangerous Navigation. But before the iourney of the Argonauts there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Iafon had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knows) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and fiftie Passengers, yet it was farre greater then any of the former times: erat enim antea paruum nauicularum visus: For in former times they used very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gaue themselves of olde to farre-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the inuention of Ships vnto them:

Primaratem ventis credere docta Tyros,

Tyrus knew first how Ships might vse the Wind.

And for those Boates called longe naues or Gallies, Plinie saith that Agesias ascribed the deuice to Paralus: and Philostephanus to Iafon: Ctesias to Samyras; and Sapphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Aegon: to which inuention the Erythraei are said to haue added certaine numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to haue increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to haue brought them to foure Bankes: the Quinq. Remi first to haue bene vsed by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans serued themselves in the Punike Warre. But these bee perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the deuiling of these Gallies on Sesofris, though Semiramis vsed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrams time. So it is said, that Danauus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the inuention; and yet Terullian (on the contrarie) giues it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians vsed to coast the Shores of the Red Sea vpon rasses, deuiled by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittans had a kind of Boat (with which they crosse the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered ouer with Leather: of which kind I haue seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naues excorio circumfusa in Oceano Britannico (saith Tentor): of which Lucan the Poet:

*Primum canas alix, madefacto vimine, parnam
Texitur in pappim, caeloq; induta iuuenco, Velloris patiens tumidum superenatat annem.
Sic Venetus flagante Pado, fusosq; Britannum Nauigat Oceano.*

The moynted Ofsyer of the hoarie Willow
Is wouen first into a litle Boat:
Then cloth'd in Bullockes Hide, vpon the billow
Of a proud Riuer, lightly doth it float
Vnder the Waterman:
So on the Lakes of ouer-swelling Poe
Sailles the Venetian: and the Brittains so On th' out-spreed Ocean.

And

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were first revealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference betwene the Arke of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long Voyages to Sea at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattell: as also common reason can tell us, that euen now when this Arte is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Noah any Ship, or vse of Ships fit for any long Navigation. For if Comer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not haue bene dead for so many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who haue cast Nations into Countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioyned both Nature, Reason, Policie, and necessitie: and to the rest, neither probabilitie, nor possibilitie.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesitch, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezechiel, CAP. 38. 39.

Now although many Learned and Reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath bene and is received: yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Iosephus as hee hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withall, so was he in this Plantation of the World very grosse and fabulous, whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his testimonies for current, haue bene by him farre misle led. But the better to conceiue what Regions of the World Comer the first sonne of Iaphet posselt, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: becaule the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find most iudicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chiefe Conductor in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Iaphet himself posselt, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Iaphet (whom Ezechiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appeare, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth of the vniuing of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Iuda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my Seruants shall bee King ouer them, and they shall haue one Shepheard, (that is) they shall be vniued as they were in Dauid time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Vnion, and disturbe the people of Israel, whom God purposed to reeuiue to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and sought to subiect them: all which were the Subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Calefyrians, next bordering Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Iudaa. The words of Ezechiel are these: Sonne of man, set thy face against Gog, and against the Land of Magog, the chiefe Princes of Mesech (or Mosoch and Tubal: and afterward; Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of Mesech and Tubal: and in the sixth verse; Gomer and all his Bands, and the House of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered the

ð. VI.

That GOMER also and his sonne TÖGORMA of the Posteritie of IAPHETH were possessed about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

O turne now to the sonnes of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I obserue, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they were multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repaire to each other, and keepe intelligence by River: because the Land was yet Defart and ouer-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South part of Chaldea, downe the River of Gihon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Pr or Orchoa neere the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the same River get vp to Babylon, and receiue succour from thence. All which Tract of Land vpon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradis calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chusite, by whom the children of Shem (which came in to that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for awhile oppressed, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Hanulab, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Cush, took both banks of Tigris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Hanulab or Susian, was anciently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Susa. Cush himselfe tooke the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and South-west-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Defart, where Ptoleme placeth the Citie of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tigriu to conuoy them into the Persian gulfes, which walseth the bankes of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sonnes of Cush might take Land downe the River as they pleased. Also the Citie of Ninne was by Nimrod founded on the said River of Tigris; and from thence a Colonye past to Charran, standing also vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seats in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward; into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Atagag, and Tubal, fate downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witnesseth Hierodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Gallatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gaue names to diuers places, as to the Mountaynes about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the Citie of Cymmeri in Phrygia: also Kosphorus Cymmerus tooke appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, fauouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptoleme calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Prouince of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaynes Moschici, in the Valley betweene the Mountaynes Moschici, and the Mountaynes Paryar-des: out of whose North part sprinketh the River Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Moscouians (saith Melanchton) and it may bee, that in proceesse of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanchton) signifieth extending, enlarging, or stretching forth.

forth. Togormas also at first did inhabite amongst his parents & kindred. The Togormians were also called Giblet; a people neighbouring the Syrdanians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phenicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Mafons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hierosolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbarie: forgetting the prophetic of Ezekiel against the Tyrrians. They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Fayres horses, and hose-men, and mules; which could not well bee driuen ouer the whole length of the Meduerran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iesephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not denie, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spantards, but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Tewes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Masconia. But for these subderrations it were infinit to examine them. Onely of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to discouer; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, and had not theretofore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could bee hardlie knowne: onely reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were couered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion ouer the rest.

From Madat the third sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Gracians bring them (as before) from Medus the sonne of Medea.

ð. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth son of Iapheth: and of Meshech, of Aram, and Meshech of Iapheth.

O Iauan the fourth sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Esay: Ecce mittam ek-ys quis aluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare in Italian, & Græciam; And I will send those that scape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Geneua here vseth the word (Tarshish) for Tarsus, a Citie in Cilicia, though Tarsus in many places betaken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneua vseth the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italie and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Iauan marres the fashon of that supposition, who so many yeeres preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tels vs that Xuthus stole out of Theffalie with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriuing at Athens, hee was graciously receiued by Erichon, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom hee receiued two sonnes, Ion, and Achæus, the supposed Ancesters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, saith Plutarch in the life of Theſeus) who, when he had ioyned Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hic non sunt Peloponnesius, ass Bona: These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looked towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: Hic sunt Peloponnesius, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of theſe affirms, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof, than hee learned of the Greeke themselves, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecdeus reasonable enough. For though it were to him vnknewe, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any; and that Iauan did not flie from the Black Sea called Alycaez.

Of Ascanez and Riphath, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Eufebius makes Alycaez the Father of the Goths. The Tenues in their Thargam make him the roote of the Germane Nation , but their expofitions are commonly very idle. Plinie findeth Afcania in Phrygia, neere the Riuer of Hylas and Cio: Arctianthe being of the fame opinion, that the Tuifcones were defcended of the Alycaezes, (for Iufcones, fith he, is as much to fay, as of the Alycaezes, propefito articulo dicit Alycaez) and that the word fignifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient fuperftition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the Lake Afcania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And amongst the Kings which came to the luccor of Troy, was Afcanius (Deo fimilis, faith Homel) like vnto God: because he was beautiful and ftrong: for in the fame manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, Os humeri q. Deo fimilis, in face and bodie like onee of the Gods. Virgil alfo remembreth fuch a Riuer, together with the Hills Gargara: as, Illes ducis amor trans Gargara, tranfg. Ionanem Afcanium. Appetite leads them both ouer the Mountains Gargara, and the vning Gargara. But this Pliny maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Arduum vpon the Riuer Afcianus, which is adioyning to Myfia, and is neere the border of the Troian Empire and the Lake Alycaez: he directs vs to finde by the description of Prufia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth far within the Countreies of Bithynia : and then from Prufia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lyeth, euen betwene Prufia and Nicea. And fo Iunias (as I conceiue him) takes them of Alycaez, to be the inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and thofe North parts of Asia. Stephanus de urbibus maketh it a Citie of Troas, built by Afcanius the fon of Aeneas: laying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Afcania the Lake of Bithynia, Ptolomie witneffeth : and Strabo giueth Afcania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Myfia, neere vnto Cio; which all agree with Plinie. For Plinie findeth Prufia (before fpooken of) neere Cio, and collefth the Iflands before Troy Alycaez.

Now, whether these place stooke name of Afamez the son of Gomer, or of Afanius the sonne of Aneaz, it might be questioned : Iure it is, that Afanius which brought Ure court to the Tronius, could not take his name from Aneaz Ionn, who was then cyther exceeding yong, or rather vnborne : and it seemeth that the Countries whence those figures came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Mysia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, which by Hieremie is called Afamez, by the figure Synecdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therfore which decieue not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremie wee shall learne of what Nation the Afamez were, whose words are these : Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nation againe her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Afamez. Eccl. vi. 17.

against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, fo called of the Mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (sayth Iunius and others before him,) and Aram anciently taken was Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia, and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the storie of Jacob and Esaú, and call it Aram-padan. Then, if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Ascanes ioynd with them (who altogether united vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shall crye much to call Askenaz Germanie or Almaine, for we heare of no swart Rutters at that siege. But the Askenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the description of Nation was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Ensebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who calls them Rhegi; or of the Iewes, who will haue them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Ephath the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Berosaldus and Perrinus thinke that he wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I like nothing to the contrary, but that he might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soile in those dayes for all the sonnes and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well vnderstood, that the Riphei were of Ephath, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paphlagones; and Riphei (saith Melanchton) signifieth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Hæneti. The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Hæneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the loue of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Hæneti; (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Hæneti) sought new Regions, they came along the Iles of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thence the Land, and peopled Myria, delirous (saith Melanchton) of a warmer soile of fruit and Wine. These Hæneti or Æneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betwene the Baltick and Adriaticke Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Venedicus is found in Euxina. This Nation, after they were possessed of Lithuania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boj and Hermondurij. Therefore, it seemeth to me, that of Ephath, came the Riphei, afterward Hæneti; and so thinketh Arius Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembered, chiefly betwene the Riuers of Vistula and Allis. The name (saith Melanchton) signifieth Wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by White-meates and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue spoken already; now therefore of Iuanus children, which were four:

Elisa, Tharfis, Cethim, Dodanim.

Of the foure sonnes of Iuanus: and of the double signification of Tharfis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

EF Elisa or Elipha, came the Aoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greekes were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Aoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in generall of Iuanus, it is probable that the Aoles and the Elis took name of Elisa, his eldest Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Iles of Elisa, Hyacinthus & purpura de insulis Elisa facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Iles of Elisa, was thy covering: The Chaldeans for Elisa write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Genoue, and Iunius, keepe the word Elisa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italia in in those dayes, nor since, that I can reade of: but those Iles of Elisa, were by a better coniecture the Iles of Greece, and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Gætulia.

Tharfis, the second Sonne of Iuanus, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharfis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharfis in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (referring the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that coniecture. The Chaldaean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharfis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharfis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldaean Paraphrast translates Tharfis (Africa). But Salomon's Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Ezion Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, nere vnto Madian, where Iethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petraea, Idumæa, or of the Chusites; and they sayled to the higher part of the East India. For it had beene a strange Navigation to haue spent three yeeres in the passage betwene India and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue beene sayled in sixe or ten daies. And if so great riches might haue bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon haue entertained that Trade also. But this enterprise of Salomon is in this sort written of in the list of Kings: Alsa King Salomon made a Nanie of Ships in Ezion Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyman sent with the Nauie his seruants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the seruants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and set from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea then that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharfis had the greatest Shippes, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharfis vsed often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Shippes of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharfis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we vse it ordinarily wherefoeuer we nauigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out euery yeere, or euery three yeere to the Sea, and therefore Tharfis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharfis is truly taken for Tharfis, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia, founded by Tharfis the second sonne of Iuanus, or by his Successors in memorie of their first parent. To this Citie arriued Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first ouerthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the Riuert to bathe and wasse his bodie, hee fell into an extreame Feuer, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharfis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iuanus, who was to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gaue the Islands betwene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharfis vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third sonne of Iuanus was Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, saith Berosaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (saith he) and signifieth percussors, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Elai 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hæc calamitas ubi Elai predicta est, qui capite uicesimo tertio inquit, venturas esse euersores Tyri ex terra Cethim. This calamitie (saith Melanchton) was foreshewed by Elai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cethim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cethim might be taken for Italie, saith Berosaldus) yet wee must take the first performance of the former Prophecie, which tooke effect by the destruction of the Tyrrians by Alexander, who after 7. Moneths siege, sacked that proud City, and cut in pieces seauen thousand principall Citizens; strangled two thousand and changed the freedom of 13. thousand others into bondage and slaueerie. Now; that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainlie in the first of the Machabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian the sonne of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Iosephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith hee) there remaineth the Citie Cithium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesseth Laertius) which Citie Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may bee that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, & that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies ouer the Aegean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Iauan, and the yongest Brother (by the most opinions) 10 sate downe at Rhodes, as neere Cethim, Tharsis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are vsed indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebrewians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the Citie of Dodana, in the Prouince of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far lesse Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the Citie of Dodana, was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posteritie might giue it that name in the memorie of their first 20 parent, as it hapned all the World ouer. For names were giuen to Cities, Mountaines, Riuers, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; and in all places by themselves, but by their successors many yeeres after: euery of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their owne names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Riuers, as to things (after their iudgements) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands, and neighbor 30
Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the sonne of Cham) peopel Babylonia, Chaldaea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the seedes of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) trauelled Southward in Arabia felix, and South- 40 westward into Arabia petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner tooke the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adioyning. The Sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards 40 the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham, which were foure: Chus, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

That the seat of Chus (the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Iosephus his Tale of an Ethiopesse wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chus.

THAT Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 10. 5. Psalm verse 51. Then Isaac came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, Hee slew all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great Citie in Thebaida, called Cheramia: (as it were the Citie of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus is 10 the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chus could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther proofe to the former. For the manifestation hereof, sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senselesse interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, that Chus could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petrea, and a part of Arabia the Happie and the Desert: which Regions Chus and the Chusites 10 presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first late downe altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this Controuersie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chus for Ethiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chus was Ethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. vers. 1. is called a woman of Chus) was a woman of the land of Ethiopia, 20 that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers Citie; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she praesided to betray both her Parents, Countrey, and friends, with the Citie it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he had described the strength of the Ethiopian Citie Meoer, which he saith at length Cambyces called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desiderare exercitum otiosum agere. 30 ferret, heste non audente manus conferere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Aethiopum Regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: when Moses was grieved that his Armie lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not fallie and come to handie strokes, there so happened this accident in the meane while. The Ethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults giuen, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not onely up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brink of subuersion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, she made mesnes to send vnto him by one of her trustiest seruants to offer her selfe vnto him, and become his wife, which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliuer the Citie into his possession; whereunto she condescending, and Moses hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

THIS Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a Citie of Arabia for a Citie of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it selfe to haue bene the Countrey of Moses his Wife, when (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, saying that the Sabaeans are Arabians, and not Ethiopians; except Iosephus can perswade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisdome of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke Moore. And 50 though Damianus a Goer speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prestre John, of the Abyssines: wherein that Ethiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princeesse: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sishac King of Egypt inuaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioyned vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to haue bene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and neere Esfion Gaber, where Salomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumae ioyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the East, to the Mediterranean by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And it wee make the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, he had formerly lived some yeeres; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing vp in Egypt, he was instructed by Iethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdoms of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, when Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro his Father in Law, Priest of Madian, and drave the flocks to the Desert, and came to the Mountaine of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, every Infant knoweth. And if we may beleuee Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and Friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianite. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepheard to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his people first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reuel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Iethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumaea, and finding the insupportable gouernement of such a multitude, he aduised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Judges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had bene an Ethiopian, it had bene a farre progresse for him to haue passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that fauoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandered fortie yeeres, and did by these late trauiels of his, seeketh to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those thicke plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he wared them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysostomus, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words haue this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moysen, &c. Apollinaris also saith, in affirming that Moses had two wives: and who doth not perceiue these things fained by them? for it is manifest that the wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that ioyneth to Arabia: so farre Chrysostomus.

†. III.

Chusli is expounded for Ethiopia, Ezech. 29. 10.

Now as Chusli is by the Septuaginta conuerted Ethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopia: so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Ethiopia, Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come vpon vpon thee and vpon thy Riuer, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Towre of Senneh, even to the borders of the blacke Moor: which last words should haue bene thus conuerted: From the Towre of Senneh to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians: betwene which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Senneh to the Ethiopians, hath no sense at all. Senneh it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Ethiopia, or the Land of the blacke Moor. So as if Nabuchodonosors conquest had bene but betwene Senneh and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victory then the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying betwene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countreies ioyneth together; or all the North parts of England, betwene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to expresse by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Senneh or Sene is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor neuer entered into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneua, and all other (in effect) haue written Ethiopia for Chusli.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. ver. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort conuerted: Laide illi egredientur nuncy a facie mea in trieribus ad conuertendam Ethiopia confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneuans: In that day shall there Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the careless Moors afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should haue bene (as in the former) amended by vsing the word Chusli or Arabia for Ethiopia or the blacke Moor, every man may see which meane vnderstandeth the Geographia of the World, knowing, that to pass out of Egypt into Ethiopia there neede no Gallies nor ships, no more then to pass out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Ethiopia being the continerment Region with Egypt, and not diuided so much as by a Riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonosor should send Gallies alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by which an Armie might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Sonies (sparing the long wearisome march ouer all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Armie might thereby surprise them vnawares in their securitie and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Senneh within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Gallie nor Ship to pass into it: being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no other wise parted from it, then one In-land thire is parted from another; and if hee had a fancie to haue rowed vp the Riuer but for pleasure, he could not haue done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling ouer high and steepie Mountaines) called Catadupe Nili, were at hand.

Lastly, as I haue already obserued, the sonnes of euery father seated themselves as neere together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the Iesse; Isaiah and his sons in Greece; and the Ilands adioyning; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sons and Grandchildren of Chusli from the Riuer of Gehon (their Fathers first seat) inhabited vpon the same, or vpon some other contiguous vnto it, as Nimrod and Hanilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtechu (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had neuer any acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treatie of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian blacke Moor, as is already remembered in the Chapter 50 of Paradise.

†. V.

A pl. cc. Elay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chusli for Ethiopia.

And as in these places before remembred, so in diuers other is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chusli, which puts the storie (where it is so vnderstood) quite out of square, one Kingdome thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of and Judaea; with the two *Egypt*s, whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South; and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the vpper Egypt) stretcheth it selfe toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Ethiopian or black *Moor*s. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had no other Nation or Family that dwell betwene them. And in the same manner did all their sons againe, and all the sons of the rest of *Noah*s children, fort themselves.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their antiquities seeme more fabulous.

His flourishing Kingdome posselt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Aegyptius (otherwise Rameses, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danaei, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the flood, in the time of Iosua, as S. Augustine conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odysse it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Ofrina, &c. And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Apion) numbeth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who continued 393. yeeres. By which other men coniecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Iosua, and about 1000. yeeres after the flood. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israel to be those Hycsos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon saith: nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporarie with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000. yeeres; and that the Stars had foure times changed their course, and the Sunne twelue fit in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Athenians and Acadians, who dare affirme, that they are more ancient then Iupiter and Elie Moore, whercof Ouid:

Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.*

The Arcadians the earth inhabited Ere yet the Moone did shine, or long was bred.

But for those 13000. yeeres it may well be true: seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their yeeres by Months, which makes after that account not about 1000. or 1100. yeeres, whether we take their Months or Lunarie yeeres to haue bene of the first kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those five diuersities of their Lunarie yeeres.

t. III.

Of certaine ruine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

Erasmus Mercator in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptian Antiquitie in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynastie (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the generall flood: and that therefore the first of the Egyptians fifteen reached the Creation, or soone after it. To which come care of Mercurius Perellius match this matter. That herein Mercurius was first deceived. Because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie was at once with the generall flood: which Eusebius maketh 132. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie being in number 179. in the time of their first King, Scaphia, to haue bene in the yeere of the world 1846. which

Eusebius

Eusebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastie was begun but in the 292. yeeres after the flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynastie to endure 115. yeeres, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse then 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but fixe yeeres; the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annins in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the flood, and the 16. to haue bene then in being at the time of the flood, Annins makes them all after it. But the contrariety of fallhood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annins had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod with the sonnes of Noah came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor farre-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conueyed Camer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnadvised. For he makes Egypt posselt, and a gouernment established in the very first yeere of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or nere in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

But whereas Pererius seeketh to ouerthrow this Antiquitie of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I doe not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either vnlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall flood, I doe verily beleue the contrary: and that not onely of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Egyptum usq. habitandum & complendum propagata sit. &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the world, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saying beleefe, it is lawfull for euery man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or caulling humour: for I thinke it the part of euery Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilitie of vni-on, then out of froward subletie, and preiudicate resoluement, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, nor at all before the Flood, I say that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, then to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double; & (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and abilitie, to beget many Children: and at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinitie. And that there was a speedie increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue bene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues built a Citie, (called Enoch) after the name of his first borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the Citie and Towre of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeeres by Pererius; and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancie of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so with in 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) aswell Assyria, Syria, and Aegypt might be posselt before the Flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeeres before the Flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For that euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie to proue it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Again, those multitudes, and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and she left not all her Kingdomes empty) doe well proue, that if the World had such plentie of people: in so few yeeres after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus governed Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Flood of Noah. And thele Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Melia to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her invasion, some what lesse or more then 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be giuen. And if but one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue bene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entered (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Aegypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleue Trogus Pompeius (Epitome d'by Iustine): Aegypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these be his owne words, speaking of Ninus. Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vxoris Rex Aegypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vxoris King of Aegypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Aegypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbrellh: Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Storics generally shew, that though Zoroaster Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for reigne authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Aegypt was posselt by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultiue a desolate and ouergrowne ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time then 200. yeeres after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Flood, so as not onely Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Melia, Arabia, Aegypt, Palastina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be comprest, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Flood? euen next flue, which cannot be refuted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially, where Death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld liuing Nations of his owne body.

M

Seladi,

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

FOR what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres? Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather then that they were not spread ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceede 50. yeeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of soules had the first Ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceiued. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue bene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (sparing such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliue; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamie might haue bene increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty ones of the first Age obserued no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men careless of life, and fearelesse of death, then the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this eniuous old Age of the World minglith together, and soweth with the seeds of Mankind?

Now if that Berosus or Ammius may be alledged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the Citie of Enoch was seated nere Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palastina (which is also a Province of Syria) and Aegypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betweene his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Ammius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be reiected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitium contraria; Let us choosethat is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Iherusalem Iewes: men that feared God of euery Nation vnder Heauen: yet by words which follow in Berosus, it is plaine that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at aduenture, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had bene inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to traualle ouer before the Flood, then after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Atica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left vpon the Earth) was vninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogyges Flood; whereby we may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries, after the generall Deluge. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first Age, then after the generall ouerflowing.

† VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

Lastly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the Nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium, By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirme out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: the Text it selfe rather teacheth the contrary: for out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or division in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessary division controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never beene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general Plantation: as Berosus sayes well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplyed, Ad comparandas novas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia being also at that time fully peopled. And if wee beleue Berosus, then not onely those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeeres after the Flood) Spain, Italie and France were also planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 166. yeeres before the Flood, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the World was overflowne, there were people in all the World which offended.

† VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

Therefore, for the Antiquitie of the Egyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor Iudge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, That Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillers or Altars (of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Gouvernours: which the Egyptians hauing added to the list and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glory or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of Antiquitie was in such sort preferred, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write that the vse of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Amnius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 1034. yeeres before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his coming in Iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens Iudgements, and every man to his owne reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being diuided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the several branches of Nilus breaking alunder from one body of the Riuer, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran to ward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next vnto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the Citie of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous Citie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Egypt is bounded betwene Memphis and Syene neere Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Citie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which significeth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Iosephus calls Egypt Mersin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais.

Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutes, (saith Iosephus) and Plinie mentioneth the Riuer Fut in Mauritania: which Riuer from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyrus) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chush and Lud were contermini and Associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

† I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven sonnes.

Canaan (the fourth sonne of Ham) posselt all that Region called by the Romans Palaestina in the Scriptures Galilea, Samarita, and Iudaea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whercof are precisely set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou goest to Gerar vntill Aszrah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorha, and Admah, and Zeboim, euen vnto Laspha. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be conuerted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorha the East, and the other Cities named flood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the vtermoost Territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the sonnes of Canaan which posselt this Countrey, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eluen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Iebus or Jebusam.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Gergeus or Gergeus.
6. Henu or Chiuem.
7. Arki or Harkus.
8. Seni or Sinais.
9. Araadi or Aruadeus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamathus, or Chamaibau.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Henuites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some of his.

Of the perizims of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Aser: for Aser, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Aserites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and the Hittites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Refor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vtermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Defart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus iuramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeast as Hebron, and Mamre, and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarabs burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

Iebusam, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Iherusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their Citie and the Countie neere it, till such time as Dauid by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Busan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations disperfed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Calefryia, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountaines of Juda, and in Idumaea neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oak.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Hewites, and Harkites.

The fift sonne of Canaan was Gergef or Gergeson, (otherwise Girzaf) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomie sets the Citie Gerasa, which Iosephus calls Gefera in the Territorie of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the possesed with Diuels; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: because their Swine filled with the cuill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergef also built Berytus (sometime Geru) afterward Felix Iulius, three miles from the River Adonis in Phoenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gaue many large priuileges.

Hewus the sixth sonne, and Father of the Hewites, inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. These Hewites, howsoeuer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembred) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iosua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased vterly to roote out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times serued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Iudges the third: They remained to proue Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandements of God.

The seventh sonne was Araceus or Hark, who betwene the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer against Tripolis) built the Citie, of Archae, Arce, or Arca, afterward Archis.

†. V.

Of Sini and Aruadi.

Sineus the eight son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparofa, which Ptolomie findes in Juda, not farre from Iebus; to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sim; Ptolomie, Simyra: Mela and Plinie, Symyrum: Brochard, Sycon, (called Synochis) neere Arca. Peregrinus thinks that Sineus inhabited the Defarts of Sini, or thereabout; but heereof there is no other certaintie then the report of Brochard, who tooke view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochis, as Ziden built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C, otherwise Kene) who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But these Cinei were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, besides their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinei, Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth sonne was Aradeus or Aradeus, who in the Ile of Aradus built the Citie Gul Tyr. Viti. Arados: opposite against which Iland on the Maîne of Phoenicia, they founded another Citie of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this Citie came S. Peter (saith Clement) & in this Ile preached the Gospell, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but wee finde no such worke of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Aruad were thy Mariners.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Calefryia at Edeffa, and founded Samaraim, which in Iosua is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samaraim (of the same Orthographic) vpon the Mountaines of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine conuertereth amisse (saith he) by Semerom. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emissani, which Plinie calls the Hemisseni, in Calefryia; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaraim, both the Hebrew Orthographic, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omir) disproueth: And he bought the Mountayne Samaria or Shemerom of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built in the Mountayne: and called the name of the Citie which hee built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoeuer the Samaritanes were descended, Iure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Iewes stood vp, they alwayes called themselves Iewes: when it suffered or sanke, they then vterly denied to be of that Nation or Familie; for at such time as they were returned from their first captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians; and partly of the naturalls.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

The last of Canaans sonnes was Hamathus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: (saith Beroaldus), of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whercof Hamathus was present. Iosephus and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, nor that Antioch with standeth on the River Orantes, on the frontier of Comagena: betwene the Mountayne Casius and the Prouince of Pieria, and Seleucia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betwene

Apamea and Emesa in Cassitis. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either : for both that Antioch vpon Orientes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than euer any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali ; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea, betwene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could nor Epiphania belong vnto them : for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betwene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land : and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directlye proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remained vnposselt, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad vnder mount Hermon, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vied, that Emath was not in Nephthali, or any way belonging to the children of Israel : because Dauid accepted the presents of Tobin King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace : which hee would not haue done, if that Territorie had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath bee comprehended, though leased altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua : for Emath is indeede situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Hermon, which ioyneth to Libanus ; and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the Mountaines, and the Citie in Nephthali should be written Hamath : and so the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Affedim : which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath, Iosephus, Hamath ; others, Emathin, or Amathicos, and the people Amathin : of which (as I take it) Ralsakeh vanteth in the second of Kings : where is the god of Hamath ?

Of the sonnes of Chush (excepting Nimrod) of whom hereafter.*

The sonnes of Chush were,	 Seba, Hauila, Sabta, Rama, Sabteca, Nimrod. 	} And the sonnes of Raama were,	 Sheba, and Dedan.
---------------------------	--	---------------------------------	--

¶ I.

That most of the sonnes of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy : and of the Sabaeans that robbed Iob : and of the Queene that came to Solomon.

Seba or Saba was the eldest sonne of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham, to make a difference betwene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the son of his brother Rama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanius;) his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the sonne of Regma with an (S) alperate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma posselt both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba tooketh that part toward the Red Sea, as nereest his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites : Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia, of which Plinie : Sabaei Arabum populi propter thura clarissimi ad utrag, maria porrecti gentibus habitant : The Sabaeans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to witte) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countie was afterwards called Arabia, a populi mixtione, saith Possellius. To this agreeth Ptolomie, who setteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leaue Sabta : for so much Montanius gathereth out of Ptolomie, because because he remembereth a Nation (called Sabai) neere the Persian Sea ; and Massabatha which descended of them. But Montanius hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama into Carmunia, for which I see no reason. Iosephus, who only attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Assyria. But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabai, which stole away Iob's Cattle, should runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petraea, and finde out Iob in Traconitis, betwene Palastina and Celestria 1200. miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, so do I thinke, that neither the Sabai on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any means execute the stealth vpon Iob, which soeuer Beroaldus shall take for nereest. But these were the Sabai of Arabia the Defart, where Gulandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is seated : the same which Ptolomie calls Sane, now Semiscasac : and from this Saba in Arabia the Defart, came those Magi or Wise men which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these : The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise men doe beleene, but out of Sabain Arabia the Defart : which Citie when my selfe was there, was (as I indged it) called Semiscasac. And to approue this opinion of Gulandinus, it appeareth that these Sabai were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disioyned with large Defarts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattell, both in respect of the Mountaines, of the sands, and of the extreame want of water in those parts : Pbi nec homines, nec bestia videntur, nec aues, imò nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperissimi ; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, nor so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but onely sharpe, and high stonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Petrus conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to visit Salomon, was of the Sabai on the East side of Arabia Felix ; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that the was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea : for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraea, twixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber : and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any faire traualle enter his Territories, free from all danger of surpris by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auoid tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Rama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the posselors of Arabia the Happy, and the Defart : onely Hauilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side Chush, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia : of which both Plinie and Ptolomie ; who withall nameth Sabotale, plin. l. 12. c. 14. Prob. l. 6. c. 14. within the walls whereof there were sometimes found fixtie Temples. Ezekiel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Rama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Easterne Arabians their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Atiopians about Ateroe, and Sabta of the Atiopians Astabari, they be not worthie any farther answer then hath already beene giuen : especially seeing these Cities preferring the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Chush, with little alterations are preferred. In Arabia the Defart is found the Citie Saba or Sane, (now Semiscasac) with the Citie of Rhegama for Rhegma ; and the Nation by Ptolomie himselfe called Rabani of Ramab. In Arabia the happy is found the Citie of Rhegama, and Rabana ; which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Saptah, not farre from the East-coast of Arabia : as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabbatha ; and to the West of Sabbatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba ; and the Nation adioyning, Sabai : and to the South thereof againe toward the streight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all these his Brothers and Nephewes which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hauilah by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom hee might passe by Boate euen vnto Rhegma the Citie of Rama, or Rhegma, set neere the Riuer of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which Rood in Ptolomies time.

¶ II.

t. II.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chusht to haue bene seated in the west Aethiopia, disproued out of Ezech: and Hieremie.

And whereas Iosephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious here in) sent Dedan the sonne of Raamah into West Aethiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verses, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Aethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) about foure thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne Aethiophans neuer saw cloth, till the Portugals seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Ciuert Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or yron chiefly.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone, was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Aethiopia, which inhabit about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterranean Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancie. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chusht, which feates they held by that name in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremie his owne words: Ely, yee Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of Elaw upon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumaeans: and Idumaea is a Prouince of Arabia Petraea: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, ioyned in that part to Petraea, the seat of his Grand-father Chusht; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumaeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Idom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

Ezech. cap. 25. v. 15.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

After Chusht it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (saith S. Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder sonne of Mizraim, was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his wrothers disperised themselves into all the Regions adioyning. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but hee is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that hee was cared not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who ioyneth them in this sort together: Come up ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the black-moores, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians being of one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut & Lud are ioyned together. Aethiopia (or Chusht) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chusht; (which were the Chushtes) the sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Egypt and Africa shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus findes also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleeue it: because Hieremie ioyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembered. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat neerer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing writing is, not Lybes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a Citie (saith he) between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike if the Citie of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Citie which was afterward Doopolis, in which S. Peter cured Aenes of the palsy) standeth neere the Torrent Gaa, not farre from the Port of Hierusalem. Yet is it not impossible but that this Citie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Selencia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third sonne of Mizraim: and so doth Postellus; and either opinion may be true.

The termination on in the Hebrew, is commonly a signe of the plurall number, as in the word Lud.

Cap. 46. v. 3.

The rest of Mizraims sonnes haue no proper Countries giuen them in the Scriptures, sauing Caslubim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleste.

These Caslubim inhabited Castotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountaine Casius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim located neere Caslubim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethrotis, not farre from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Plinius, Sethrotis, of the Citie Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemie calls Hercules paraus. Of the Caslubim and Caphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyl (which is) Alienigene, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) doe not vse the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph). Their principall Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gasei, Ascalonites, Azotij, Gethici, and Accaronites. Isidore affirms, that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that Citie the Countrey adioyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife, with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was also King of the Philistims, in these words: wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech gouerned the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land upon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Casarea Palestina, or Stratus Towre) which was the South-border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the Riuer of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: and Goliath was of Geth one of the five Cities abouenamed. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lyrano. They mastered the Israelites at several times about 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel, but in the end this yoke was taken off by David and laid on themselves.

It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countrey adioyning, were held by the sonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Iosua, yet at the time of the promise it was possesed by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomie. The Heuites dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses the Prophet Hieremie witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Hane not I brought up Israel out of the land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Caphtor, and Atram from Kir? so I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, ex Palestina de Cappadocia, ex Syris de Cyrene, this conuersion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Citie directly West from Egypt, betwene Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia vnder the Assyrians: Rumus hath it Kir; and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneat.

But

But Pererius calls Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palastina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palastina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglaiphassar King of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

§. XV.
Of the Issue of Sem.

†. I.
Of Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sonnes of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

He posteritie of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them hee proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Storie of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sonnes the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him & Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearfall of their names, sauing that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauiug India) which I beleuee Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Havilah the sonnes of Iocan afterward repayed. Hij filij Sem ab Euphrate fluuijo partem Asia vsq. ad Oceanum Indicum sennerrunt; These sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered Acts 2. vers. 9. and the Princes of Persia, which name then beganto be out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchie being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witnesseth Daniel:) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolomie) in Daniel, and seated in the border of Susiana.

Assur (as most Historians beleuee) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who did dayning the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beautie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Euery mans hand hath benee in this Storie, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoyled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoeuer Haradum and D. Sincus extend this Empire, and honor this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfull Princes among them, had yet the Mountaine Taurus for the vmoist of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them? whom my Fathers haue destroyed? at Gozan, and Haran, and Refeph, and the children of Eden which were at Telsassar. where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the Citie Sepharuaim, Hena and Iuah? All these were indeede but pettie Kings of Cities, and small Countries, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Refeph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iturra, vnder Libanus: the Ile of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea, Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Egypt had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina and Pharcia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chalites, because he established the first Empire from whom the most memorabile storie of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith Saint Hierome, and Iosephus, but it must bee those Chaldeans about Yr: for the sonnes of Cham possesse the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela; and Shela, Heber; of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Sonne of Sem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

†. II.
Of Aram, and his Sonnes.

Aram the fifth and last Sonne of Sem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syru (saith Ensebius Esay 7. v. 8. out of Iosephus) which Syru liued before Moses was borne, the same which others call Ensebius p. 10. 8. the sonne of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharajm, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum fluminiu, Syria compassed with two Rivers: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Yaacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as these his owne words conuerted witnesseth: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi iudei. Syri Aramensis & Arameos vocant; These which we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Aramenians and Arameans.

Against this opinion, that Aram the sonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not onely of those in Syria Inter-amni, which is Mesopotamia) some reade, Genes 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the original read Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the Historie of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel's Posteritie could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Naharajm, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinks in his note vpon Genes 25. 26. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomie calls Anabaria (so called from the River Chaboras, which diuiding it runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharajm (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Rivers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomie, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

Vz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that Citie, faith Iosephus and S. Hierome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Ezra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abraham his ward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest sonne of Aram dwelt neere vnto his father, who inhabited the bodie of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adioyning to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the Prophet Hieremie: Reioyce and be glad O Daughter 10 of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adioyning to Basan, hauing Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Sir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: hauing in it many Citie and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremie: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

C. 27. v. 20.

Hul the second sonne of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third sonne, parent to the Acarnanians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should 20 leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the Iesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as farre as Euphrates, where Prothomy setteth the Citie of Chelle.

Gether (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children feathers, to carrie them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwaies keepe the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Iunius: (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neere his brothers, in the bodie of Syria, and in the Province of Cassiotis, and Seleucus, where Prothomy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Mefch the North part of Syria, betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neere the Mountaine Mafius. The certaintie of those Plantations can no other- 30 wise be knowne then by this probability, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same Land about him: for hee wanted no scope of Territorie for himselfe and them; neyther then when the World was newlie planted, nor in many hundred yeres after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desert parts of the World, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and policie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also sought a Prouince apart, and to themselves; giuing to the Citie therein built their owne names, thereby to leaue their 40 memorie to their Posteritie: the vse of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdaining the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Pera excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessible to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap. 8. S. 7.

Mes the fourth sonne is made the parent of the Mæonians: of whom something hath bene spoken already. Arphaxad the third sonne of Schem, begat Shelah, and Iteber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Isctan: and in Phaleg time was the Earth diuided. 50

t. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THE many people which at the diuision (at Phaleg's birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at eyther. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out 50 of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeere after the Flood 101. and liued in all 239. yeeres, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeeres after the Flood, ere the children of Noah leuered themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeeres as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, that if 70. persons of the Familie of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeeres, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so loone after the Flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing receiued the blessing of God, Increase and multiplie, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeeres time: and the sonnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeeres of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceiue that Phaleg tooketh that name after the diuision, in memorie thereof: as Iosephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phaleg's death (which hapned in the yeere, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeeres before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeeres after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeeres: in the 43. yeere of whose reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. yeeres before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not bene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Arius King of Arabia a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq. armis præstabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Citie in Armenia; receiued Barzani into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seuen Children; vanquished all those Regions betwene Nilus and Tanais, the Aegyptians, Phanicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000. proue it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they fought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had bene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled euery where at the verie instant, but by times and degrees. And surely whatsoeuer mens opinions haue bene herein, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confu- 50 sion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeere 101. after the Flood, which was the yeere that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or tenne yeeres after hee arriued, saith Berosus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had bene giuen him at the time of this confu- sion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angell; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esa; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, where as the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, hee fore-told the diuision which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserued any such honour, if hee had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispercion followeth increase of people of necessitie; and this Prophecie (if any such had bene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and Citie of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue prooffe) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (whereupon Phelag tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IIII.

Of the sonnes of Ioctan, the other sonne of Heber.

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Afamath, or Chatzar.
4. Iare, or Iaraah, or Kerath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Vzal, or Vxal.
7. Dicklach, or Diela.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimacl.
10. Sheba or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Hauilah, or Chanila, and
13. Iobab.

The sonnes of Ioctan were

Althoſe ſonnes of Ioctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the Eaſt parts of the world, or India, euen from the Riuer Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of thoſe thirteen Sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall: And their dwelling was from Melba as thou goeſt vnto Separ a Mount in the Eaſt. Of all theſe thirteen Sonnes, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah. Concerning whoſe names, to auoid confuſion, it is to be obſerued, that among the ſonnes of Chufh, two of them had alſo the names of Sheba and Hauilah. Abraham had alſo a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Keſura. But Seba the ſonne of Chufh, and Sheba the ſonne of Rhegma his Nepheue, we haue left in Arabia Felix: and Hauilah the ſon of Chufh vpon Tigriſ. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as ſome haue thought) the Father of the Sabaens in Perſia: of which Nations Dionyſius de Orbis ſitu, maketh mention. Primum Sabai; poſt haec ſunt Paſſagardæ; prope verò hoſ ſunt Taſci, The firſt are Sabaens: after theſe be Paſſagardæ, and next theſe the Taſci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gaue gifts, and ſent them away from Iſaac his ſonne (while he yet liued) Eaſtward to the Eaſt-Country: heereupon it is ſuppoſed, that this Saba the ſonne of Abraham wandered into Perſia: for Perſia was accounted the furthermoſt Eaſt-Country in reſpect of Iudæa; which alſo Ouid ſetteth vnder the Sun riſing. Yet ſeeing the reſt of Abraham's ſonnes feared themſelves on the borders of Iudæa, I rather chooſe to leaue Saba the ſonne of Abraham in Arabia the Deſart, where Ptolomie ſetteth a Citie of that name.

But Saba the ſonne of Ioctan, the ſon of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it ſelfe. For Dionyſius Afer in his Periegeſis, (or deſcription of the World) which hee wrote in Greece Verſe, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabai. Taxilis hoſ inter medios habitat Sabani: In the middleſt of theſe dwell the Sabai, and the Taxili, ſayth this Dionyſius.

†. V.

Of Ophir one of Ioctan's ſonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Salomon.

Ophir alſo was an Inhabitant of the Eaſt India, and (as Saint Hierome vnderſtands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull with gold, which are now knowne by the name of Moluccas. Iofephus vnderſtands Ophir to be one of thoſe great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Cherſoneſi, or Peninſula: of which there are two very notorious; Callectus, and Malacca. Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but but he ſets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther Eaſt.

Aride Montanus bur of the ſecond of Chronicles, the third Chapter and ſixth Verſe, gathereth that Ophir was in Cameria, looking into the Weſt Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, on the South Sea; by others Mare Pacificum. The words in the ſecond of the Chronicles are theſe: And they ſurdayed the houſe with precious ſtones, for beaſties; and the gold was gold of Paruaim. Iunius takes this gold to bee the gold of Hauilah, remembered by Moses in the deſcription of Paradiſe: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Chananea a Province of Suſiana called Barbatia, ſo called (as he thinks) by corruption for Paruaim: from whence thoſe Kings ſubiected by Dauid, brought this gold, with which they preſented him; and which Dauid preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

But this ſancie of Peru hath deceiued many men, before Montanus, and Pleſius, who alſo tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this queſtion may be a ſubiect of no further diſpute, it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: ſure I am that at leaſt America hath none, no nor any Citie, Village, or Mountaine ſo called. But when Francis Piſarro firſt diſcouered thoſe Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) ſome of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by ſignes (as they could) the name of the Countrey, and pointing with their hand athwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderſtood them, let it downe in the Diurnall of their enterpriſe, and ſo in the firſt deſcription made, and ſent ouer to Charles the Emperour, all that Weſt part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer ſince as diuers Spaniards in the Indies aſſured me; which alſo Acoſta the Ieſuite in his naturall and morall Hiſtorie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus alſo findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of Ioctan, who as hee ſuppoſeth navigated from the vmoſt Eaſt of India to America: it is moſt true, that Iucatan is nothing elſe in the language of that Countrey, but [What is that? or [What ſay you? ?] For when the Spaniards aſked the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) What aſke you, or What ſay you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountaynous Countrey on the South ſide of Trinidad and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of thoſe new Regions which they diſcouered, pointed to the Hills a farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to ſay, as high Hills or Mountaynes. For at Paria begins that maruailous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South, and ſo hath that Countrey euer ſince retained the name of Paria.

The ſame hapned among the Engliſh, which I ſent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuile to inhabit Virginia. For when ſome of my people aſked the name of that Countrey, one of the Saluages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to ſay, as, You wear good clothes, or gay clothes. The ſame hapned to the Spaniard in aſking the name of the Iland Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that ſelfe place which the Sea incompaſſed, they answered, Cacri, which ſignifieth an Iland. And in this manner haue many places newlie diſcouered bene intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore wee muſt leaue Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout ſuch an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it ſelfe (towards Perſia) in Hauilah, now Suſiana, and all along that Eaſt Indian ſhore, yet the greateſt plenty is taken vp at the Philippines, certayne Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the Eaſt India. And by the length of the paſſage which Salomon's ſhips made from the Red Sea, (which was three yeeres in going and coming) it ſeemeth they went to the vtermoſt Eaſt, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede theſe that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finiſh that navigation in two yeeres, and ſometimes leſſe: and Salomon's ſhips went not about a tenth part of this our courſe from hence. But wee muſt conſider, that they euermore kept the coaſt, and crept by the ſhores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vſe of the Compaſſe was knowne, it was impoſſible to navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomon's ſhips could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not bene for the plenty of gold in the East India Ilands, farre about the mines of any one place of America) to saile euery yeere from the West part of America thither, and there to haue strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Ilands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Manila. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off then Ophir in the East, to haue sped worse: neither could he nauigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas hee had no coast to haue guided him.

Tolstius also gathereth a fantastickall opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrey, whose Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaynes Salomon affirmeth to bee in Scythia Asiatice, in these wordes: Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griffes tenent uniuersa, alites feracissima, Arimaesi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countreies abound in gold, and rich stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaesi make warre. These Arimaesi are said to haue bene men with one eye onely, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristotellus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Plinius in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleeue none of them. And for these Arimaesi, I take it that this name signifying one-eyed, was first giuen them by reason that they vied to weare a vizard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Salomon borroweth these things out of Plinie, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreame North, at a place called Gislotron, or the Caeue of the Northeast winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall: That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and vnderstanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be faigned in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be auowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountains which are very rich & full of gold, inhabited onely with Tygres, Lyons, and other rauinous and cruell beasts: vnto which if any man ascend (except his strength bee very great) he shall be sure to finde the same warre, which the Arimaesi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or secke to defend that metall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their yong-ones, they grow enraged and aduenturous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegartos, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they diue for the pearle. And though the Alegartos know not the pearle, yet they finde fauour in the fish and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha and Scapher named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan: with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

OF Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir past into the Ilands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Hauilah, it is meant by Hauilah in the East India, which tooke name of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan: but Hauilah, which Pisón compasseth, was so called of Hauilah, the sonne of Chus, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture: Sauis fecit the Amalekites from Hauilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Sauis made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of Ioctan, these three, Saba, Hauilah, & Ophir, thought at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Mafius or Mesb, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their issues remooued into the East India, leaving the other

other Families of Ioctan, to fill the Countreies of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue bene from Mesb vnto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesb to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountaine, Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Indea, is neuer farther extended then into Persia. But Mesb is that part of the Mountaine of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuier Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charan: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembered by Moses, Siphara by Ptolemie, standing to the East of the Mountaine Mafius; from whence Ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beaute and riches thereof. But this was in proesse of time.

The other fashion of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations; contrary to reason and possibilitie. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off then in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vsed: as in Numbers 24. Balaac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East, which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesseth this place of Deuteronomie) Because they hyred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharajim, to curse thee: for Aram Naharajim was Syria fluminum, which is Mesopotamia, as is aforesaid.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable coniecture, the Guides which I haue followed herein and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publique, other then the discouery of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vnture reports left Honor without a Monument, and Veritie without Memorie: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darke forgetfulness ought to haue buried, and covered ouer for euernmore. And although the length and disfluishing Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and memory of the Worlds first planters after the flood (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot steps of Antiquitie (as appeares by that which hath bene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-growne: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phoenicia hath Zidon, to which Citie the eldest Sonne of Canaan gaue name; so hath Cilicia Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumians, Libyans, Moorers, and other Nations, haue preferred from the death of forgetfulness some signes of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government vnder the eldest of Families to Regall, and from regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

I followeth now to encrease how the World began to receiue Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcitie of People) vnder-went no other Dominion then Paternitie and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes vsed both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Grauitie: the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouern.

Gouernour ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleued them as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Gracians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedaemonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedaemonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were, so are they called Eldermen: and againe, Ratio et prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellassent Senatum; If reason and aduisement were not in old men, our Ancesters had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet wee doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Governors or Counsaillers of State, there is a signe that the first Governors were the Fathers of Families, and vnder them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietie, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Proprietie or Mastership: the correlative of the one is the subiect, of the other the slave. Ad Caesarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietates; Caesar hath power ouer all; and euery man proprietie in his owne: and againe, Caesar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Caesar holdeth all in his power, and euery man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seede seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouer-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, ytterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habitually) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and tolt to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisdom was seuered from power, and strength from charitie: Necessitie (which bindeth euery nature but the immortall) made both the Wife & Foolish vnderstand at once; that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouer-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion prevent it. For the mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mighty then themselves: the feeble fell vnder the forcible; and the equall from equall received equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better tryall, no lesse perilous then an vnindurable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselves to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Government, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and corrosiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which inuented, and the same Reason which approped souereigne power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discern her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, private afflictions in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance both good and euill.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not gouerned by any other lawes then the wills of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Lane sees one while too much, another while (saith) nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeeres (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that government which

primum iudicium

causis praeueniens

had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an even ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancie of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues onely, so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pistor) Principes, quia iustiterant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dei & dii; De aures sacula part. 1. Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessitie; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not liue and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himselfe by his eternall providence hauing ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the very Bees haue their Prince; the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safetie. The most high beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth ouer it whomsoever hee Dan. 5. 21. pleaseth. By me (saith Wisdom, spoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes Prov. 8. 15. rule, and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings: and that this Dan. 2. 21. power is giuen from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate; Thou couldest haue Iohn 19. 11. no power at all against me, except it were giuen thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold Iustice that the world hath bene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iustice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of Families gouerned their Children, and Nephewes, and Families, in which gouernment the Obedience was called naturall Pietie: Again, by a Iustice diuine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God: and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the Obedience to this we call Dutie. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne Children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creator; as we reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had bene taught by their Parent, the Father of mankind.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane societie.

What other Policie was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the flood, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first age: it being possible that many Princes of the Aegyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the generall flood: and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyrannic in Government, or from some rougher forme of Rule, then the Paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who Berosus lib. 1. maltred (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership failed, three severall sorts of Government were in severall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approued, was the Government of one, ruling by iust Lawes, called Monarchie: to which Tyrannie is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equitie: and of this condition ought euery Magistrat to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers shall thou make thee Deut. 16. 18. in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement.

The second Government is of diuers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracie, or Optimum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vsurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vnjust ruling of the confused multitude, sediciously swaying the State: contrary to their owne Lawes and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly exprest by Tholofanum, vniuersi, paucorum, & multorum, Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policie since the second increase of Man-kinde, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gaue Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many Houholds, (man by nature louing societie) ioyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicius, of the Greeke μικρον, which signifieth a House, or of the word (Via) because it hath diuers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a societie of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke παγος, which signifieth a Fountaine: because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) dranke of one Spring or Streame of water: To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires answereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impetie began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from outrage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to ioine and sit together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them first with bankes and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, because wals were opposed against Enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safte and defence: as also they were called Vrbes, ab urbe, because when they were to build a Citie, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Vrbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Vrbs signified no other then the very wals and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multis uisio coisistit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the Citie, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of Subiects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subiects are also knowne. For every Citizen is also a Subiect, but not every Subiect a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no subiect, but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken a Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Μεγιστος) and so the Greekes call them Μεγιστανες, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and dutie of every Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equitie; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresth both the cause efficient, and finally, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. Hee also teacheth in the same place; That every soule ought to be subiect to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained; and that whosoever resisteth their power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof; and shall not only be therefore subiect to the iudgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any subiect therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or crueltie: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselves to the power of Magistracie. Christ commanded that all due to Caesar should be giuen vnto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremie commanded the Israelites (euen those that were Captiues vnder Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Iacob blessed the King of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) then that they should be wanting: Preferat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King, then no King: to which also Tacitus subiecth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his Historie) sub malo principe esse quàm nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince then none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no libertie more safe, then to serue them: Neg, enim libertas tutior ulla est (saith Claudian) quàm Domino seruire bono; No libertie (saith he) more safe for vs then to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainly howlocuer it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, then vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wise man that is cruell, then vnder the foolish and barbarous crueltie of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Government, That kind of rule which a man would disdaine in his owne house, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Houholds ioyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselves vnder one Gouernour, and Government, they so ioyned, were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and the Families became strong and dispersed into severall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Contentious- nicle being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then fought for no larger Territorie then themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacie of fare, or curiositie of dyer, then to maintaine life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if we vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicitie of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly becaft vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empire, (when Princes plaied their Prizes, and did then onely woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age; so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euer Liberality ouerflow her banks & bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policie and example. But Age and Time doe not onely harden and shrinke the openit and most Ioniall hearts, but the experience which bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne estates before their eyes, and (wisthally) perswaderh them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings vnder the Sunne whose means are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this fallst out in the Reigne of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his dayes be many: for our younger yeeres are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, wee praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeede) the grievous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the grave, make the times seeme so differing and displeasing : especially the qualitie of mans nature being also such, as it adoth and extollet the passages of the former, and condeitneth the present state how iust soeuer : Fit humana malignitatis visio, ut semper vetera in laude, presentia in fastidio sint : It comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignitie, that we alwayes extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious : For it is one of the errors of wayward Age : Quod sint laudatores temporis acti : That they are praisers of fore-past times, forgetting this aduice of Salomon : Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better then these : for thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing : to which purpose Seneca, Maiores nostri quæsti sunt, & nos querimus, posteri querentur, euerfos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi : Our Ancesters haue complained, we doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth reigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the viduall discourtes of Age and misfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Arnobius? Nova res quandocumq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus quibus caput nona fuit & repentina : what soeuer is new, in time shall be made old : and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made Golden, this we may set downe for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crowns : so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of Subjects to Princes : so (relatiuely) he gaue the care and iustice of Kings to the Subjects ; hauing respect, not onely to the Kings themselves, but euen to the meanest of his Creatures : Nunquam particulari bono seruit omne homin ; The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one onely : for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike : and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs ; and by a generall loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience : For Potestas humana radicitur in voluntatibus hominum : All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobilitie : and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

A

ND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authoritie began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen, vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobilitie, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers : and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glory or worldly Nobilitie necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobilitie denomination in the beginning. That such as excelled others in vertue : were so called : Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ alijs notabilis. But after such time as the deferred Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his Posteritie, Saint Hierome iudged of the Succession in this manner : Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent : I see no other thing to be affected in Nobilitie, then that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancesters. For if Nobilitie be Virtus & antiqua diuitia ; Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceede in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobilitie, then the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Pines) be a witness of vertue and well-doing : and Nobilitie (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage : then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, or in Ladie, and other Saines : men, in whom there remaine but the dregs and vices of ancient Vertue : Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weedes. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountaines, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled : Ex terra fertilis produciuntur aliphanda Cicada, Venusia, &c. ex terra infelix pretiosum aurum : Out of fruitful ground arise (sometimes) precious Stecorina and out of barren (soile) precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie : the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the Common-weale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Vertue, seruing his Prince and Country, and being descended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our felues acquire by our Vertue and well desertings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both naturall by Descent, and also personall ; yet if Vertue be wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and aquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred : For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light vpon such a one ; as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which he calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Siluer or fauour : and these be indeede but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies will they knew well how to wipe off againe. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our felues of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour, then Nobilitie, and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamitie is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is borne in shame, of a Poore body and barren minde : for (according to the same Father) : Dele suum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronata nitorem gloria, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill crowned glory, that then thou mayest consider thy selfe nakedly : for thou comest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Comest thou thence with thy Myre, or glittering with Jewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold : If thou castest and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe ouer, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched and miserable man, and blushing because he is naked, and weeping because he is borne, and repining, because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betwene it and dust : which if thou dost not beleene (saith S. Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchres & Monuments of thy Ancesters, and they shall easily perswade thee by their owne example, that thou art dust and dust : so that if man seeme more Noble and beautiful then dust, this proceedeth not from the diuersitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creator.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life ; not in the fleshly Line :
For bloud is brute, but Gentrie is Diuine.

And howsoeuer the custome of the World haue made it good, that Honors be cast by birth vpon vnworthy Issues : yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his Fellow-Princes : There is an euill (saith he) that I haue seene vnder the Sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth : Folly is set in great excellencie.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus : and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Floud that reigned like Soueraigne Lord : and that his beginning seemeth to haue bene of iust authoritie.

The first of all that reigned as Soueraigne Lord after the Floud was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects : either for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others : or else in that hee was begotten by by Chubb, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time then some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoever, seeing Mofes in expresse words calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chubb, other mens coniectures to the contrary ought to haue no respect.

This Empire of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to mee that Me-lanchton conceiued not amisse hereof: the same exposition being also made, by the Authour of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirmes that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, Abster or seuerer Gouverneur, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authority. And therefore is hee in this respect also called a mightie Hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts and 10 Theeues. But Saint Augustine vnderstands it otherwife, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo inuolens est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoeuer this word (a mightie Hunter) be vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vsurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrewes; nor that Sem was in this disobedient Troupe, 20 or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Io-tan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldea about the Citie of Ur, from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the vnbeseeming worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) 30 did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Illues: In familia Heber remansit hac lingua; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vsed; yea, it was anciently and before the Flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (scilicet Calestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodore, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius, Vergera, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoeuer we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, then by violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

But Enzo, and out of him Nauclerius with others, make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierome vpon Ose; and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Bel; qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos; There did Ninus reigne after the death of his Father Belus, who first governed in Babylon sixtie five yeeres. But it could not be vnknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establishor of that Empire: Mofes being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome (saith he) 40 was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was maruailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authours. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnauerat: ibi was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words doe not disproue that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Caesar overthrew the liberty of the Roman Commonwealthe, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperour: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authority ouer the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne Rule, as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Peterius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were Kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable then that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Stelsius affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie, then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Affrya, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof turne from his obedience, whom hee recovered againe by strong hand; which was casie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time. 30

— Dicitur aliam
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis urbem.

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercators arguments; It may be answered, that such 40 an addition might haue bene giuen to many other Kings as well. For if wee may beleeue Iustine, then were Pexoris King of Aegypt, and Tanais of Scythia mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Mofes (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betwene them.

For whereas Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue invaded & mastered those Cities so farre removed from Babel, namely Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; & both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true. That euer Nimrod invaded any of these Cities, but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beliefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuaginta calls Arbarch, and Epiphanius, Arphal; Ninus takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Academ for Academ. Others vndervnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to be one Citie: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charram, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, & Charram are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Acad: and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Citie of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Auguſtine, Oreg, and Paginius Erec; this place Iunius vnderstands for Aracea in Susiana; but there is also a Citie in Comagena called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certain proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third Citie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinists: of which Am. Marcellinus, Saint Hierome takes it for Seleucia; Hieroſolymitanus for Cresiphon: others doe thinke it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the Land of Shinaar: so as in this Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiensis, that the foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Cities farre removed, and in severall Prouinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneue translation fauouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Agypt: but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Citie at all to be found in Agypt: Babylon of Agypt being all one with the great Citie of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood Mempbis the ancient Citie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath bene formerly proued in the Chapter of Papadise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, wee may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

S. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur for the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Affryia: a controuersie we wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confute the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort hee conuerteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalab, in terra Shinaaris; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalab, in the land of Shinaar: and hee went forth of this land into Affryia, and built Ninive. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Affryia: the land being so called in Moses' time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answere the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter hee setteth downe the sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Japheth, vnto whom Sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's sonnes, be hee eldest or youngest: because hee was first to be spoken of: with whom (hauing last named him) hee proceedes and setteth downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest sonne; and then speaks of Tanah and his sonnes: for of the rest rest of that Familie he is silent. Anon after he numb'reth the sonnes of Ham, of which Chush was the eldest: and then the sons of Chush and Mizraim, and afterward of Canaan, leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disioyne the storie of the Hebrewes. But after hee beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had bene against order; neither would Moses haue past ouer so lightly the erection of the Affryian Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shem's sonnes which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sonnes of Chush, because he founded the Babylonian and Affryian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returnes to speake of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, to also in the eleventh hee maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then hee beginneth with the issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israhel. And of Iunius opinion touching Assur, was Caluin: to which I conueniently add P. Commaſtor, in his historia Scholastica, gaue an entrance, who after hee had deliuered this place in some other sense, he vseth these words: Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est) Regnum Affryorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proauui Abrahami factum est; (which is) Or else it is not to be vnderstood of Assur the sonne of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdome of the Affryans) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the differences in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Affryian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had begunning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the sonne of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Viterbiensis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tornellius: who saith he tooke vpon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Affryans, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Affrya, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Ose 5. &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the sonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-bishop of Metz in the yeere of Christ 854. an ancient and learned Writer, vnderstands this place with Commaſtor, or Commaſtor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Iunius: to which words of Moses he giueth this sense: De hac terra Affryorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, B. A. filij, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Affryans, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of Ninus the sonne of Belus. On the contrary Caluin obiekteth this place of Esay: Behold the land of the Chaldees, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness; then which there is no one place in the Scriptures that hath a greater diuerſitie in the translation and vnderstanding, in so much as Michael de Palatio vpon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it ouer. But Caluin seemeth hereby to inferre, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldees, therefore also Assur rather than Nimrod established the Affryian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former translation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or Citie of the Chaldees, by Esay remembered: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example vnto those Phoenicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea by strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Affryans utterly wasted and destroyed: where-by he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre (in-vincible, as themselves thought) should also soone after be ouer-turned by the same Affryans: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Ecce terra Chaldaeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robustos eius, suffoderunt domos eius, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is)

Behold the Land of the Chaldaans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Genera) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captive, they undermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldaorum, ex hac desolata est ab Assyrijs, quoniam murus eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus understood: If thou goe over to Chitim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt have no rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldaans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus convert it thus: Ecce terra Chaldym, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundavit eam navibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriverunt ades eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldaans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Iunius in the place of ships lets the word (pro Barbarijs) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Genera, by the Barbarians. But this is vndoubted that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis; from the Macedonians, and other Gracians vnder the name of Citim; also by the Aegyptians, the Chaldaans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Marr Towne of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Vr or Vrchoa in Chaldaa, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (even that streame which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopp'd vp. For (as we have heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Ramah) dwelling on the east banks of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalde did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Vr or Vrchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over Land they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Vr of the Chaldaes was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldaa, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopp'd vp. Eius cursum vetustas aboluit (saith Niger.) And Plinie: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen Assum; Time hath worne away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldaes, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Vr; and (by Hecateus) Camerina; by Ptolomie, Vrchoa: and by the Greekes, Chaldaopolis, The Citie of Chaldaa: which the sonnes of Shem, vntill Abraham's time, inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Vr of Chaldaa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God foreseeing, commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus converted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approued, because it was a Port Towne: and the River so farre vp as this Citie of Vr was in ancient time navigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desart were and are the confronting, and next people off all other vnto it. For Chaldaa is now called Archaldar, which significeth desart Lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Iturians) addeth, that they are of all other people the most salvage; calling them, Homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Iunius, nor the interpretation of Comester and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived any thing that I haue read that Assur is in this place diuerly taken (as for the sonne of of Sem, when he is (spoken of as a Builder of Vr; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldaes by Assur (into which the most of the posteritie of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove that the same Assur built Nimue, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set vp a Statue or Image to be honored as god. Now if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he must be if he founded Nimue, then all those which seeke to giue him the honor thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Nimue (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very vnworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsiō thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the same streame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus's wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie which she only finished: so also Ninus of Nimue: Quam quidem Babylonem postuit inflaurare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp againe some part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the River: which worke of his flood till Alexanders time, whereupon hee wanted thus: Is not this great Babel which I haue built?

Deut. 4. 27.

§. IIII.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

BUT to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those 4 Cities before remembered, Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria, & in Assyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Nimue, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that hee spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adjoining, and that his trauailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Nimue, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his Successors in many yeeres after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an aduancement and encouragement: in whole time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, a sermonis linguarum terrarū, distinctio; By reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after hee had reigned 114. yeeres; of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in dis-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes and ouer-flowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other then of his begun enterprise against Sabatus King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Sagra, whose sonne and successor Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Ninus; the followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begunne.

§. V.

§. V.

That we are not to marvaile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanaïs of Scythia.

Hat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soon after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Nimrod is made manifest) the causes were threefold, (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princesse liberrall and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainments many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisedome ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receiue all those helps and supplies, which 10 they eyther want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troupe (after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they posselt, and gouerned by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankind straggled abroad like beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, & vnder-tooke to inhabit all the knowne parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Nimrod time, would not haue beene posselt in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were; neyther did those that were sent, and trauelled far off (order being the true parent of prosperous successe) vnder take 20 so difficult enterprizes without a Conducter or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humor that aspired. Thirdlie, Necessitie resolu'd all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enioy the harvest of their owne Trauailles: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which fought after any proportion of greatnesse, eyther possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vnder takings and Conquests of Nimrod (the son of Belus) made it apparent: for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, 30 what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him Souer. Ignite and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also rayed themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successor) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatus I take to be the same, which Iustine calls Tanaïs; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had beene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me 40 rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reineccius all one with the great Sesostris, that liued certaine Ages after Nimrod. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affixe vnto it.

Hence this second King and Succesfour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath beene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) giuen by Nimrod, then assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrius against Julian calls the Father of Nimrod Arbelus, affirming that he was the first 50 of all men that caused himselfe to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldaean Tongue; and therefore did Nimrod and Semiramis giue that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldaean Princes, and Babylonian Satraps: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in infinitie) thos voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Belphegor, Belschub, and Belshephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldaean conuert the word Baal by the Latine, Principes militie, Chiefe in the Warre; though Daniel was so called (saith Suiden) Ob honorem exaltationis arcuamur rectorum, In honour of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Bael, and Baal, to haue the same signification: Nimrod of Chaldeans and sayeth, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Nimrod in memorie of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lyrannus) came Idola-trie, and the first vse of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Bel by Vesuvius, old orancient; adding, that as among the Affrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punicke or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God. Glycas makes it an Affrian name properly; and Iosephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phogor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel foundeth (God) and Schub (Flies or Hornets:) by which name (notwithstanding) the Iewes expresse the Prince of Deuils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And as that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be iustly to be vsed towards God; yet in respect that the same was giuen to Idols, God both hated it and forbid it. And the vsing of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tantum Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Bel- sephon, Belphephon is expounded out of Faciur, Dominus specula vel conspectus: The Lord of the Watch-Towre, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpheor, or Baalpheor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Demidant; and therefore the word ioyned expresth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the Sonne Iupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturri di- cuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regum qui urbes considerant senisimi; primogeniti eorum Ioues & Iunones; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortissimi; The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnes; their first-borne Iupiters and Iunoes; their vnsant Nephewes Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Viner) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Nimrod, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Iupiter Babylonius, whom the Aegyptians (transported by the Dreames of their An-tiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Libya the Daughter of Epa- phus begat this Iupiter Belus, who was Father to Aegyptus. They adde, that this Be- lus carrying a Colonie to the Riuer of Euphrates, there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Aegyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Ephus and Isis, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athenes) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom wee speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Aegyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

WS for the Babylonian Belus, hee was the most ancient Belus, and the Inditour of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Aegyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it did remaine in his time.

Of the Sepulcher of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Over the River (saith he) there are Car-Sabab, Liby, & demus, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tombe, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Bricks, a furlong high, and on many sides had a furlong in breadth. It appeares by Cyrius against Iulius, that hee obtained diuine worshipping liuing.

living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur a subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: persequeruntur igitur Assyrii, & finitima illi gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their subjects with title of Deities (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations have persecuted, sacrificing to him. Euen Arius also, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who succeeded next after Nimys, was made an Idoll-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Qingus) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battailor Caucasus of the Rocks of Iapheth slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus saith Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without diuine worship, only in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiue; and so afterward the Deuill crept into those wooden and brazen carcases, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Sidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt homines fuerunt, et pro vniuersi iusq; vita meritis vel magnificentia, colapad ius post mortem caperunt: sed Demonibus persuadentibus, quos ita pro sua memoria honorauerunt, minores Deos existimauerunt: ad ista vero magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum fignenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans ascribed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to bee honoured of his owne. But at length (the Deuils persuading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Sidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregorie Gentilis (saith he) inuentrix & Author in Plal. caput est imaginum; Gentilisme is the inuentress and ground of Images: and Ambrose; Gentiles lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantus. Et ueretur (saith Lactantius) ne religio uana sit, si nihil uideant quod adorent; They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shif this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian fasten it selfe with the distinction of Doulin and Hyperdoulin, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures haue not onely no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the Practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any grauen image, nor all the threatenings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remove, weed it, or by feare, or by any persuasions lead the harts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction then these? Take therefore good heed to your selues (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selues, and make you a grauen image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no grauen Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, for it is written in the Booke of Wisedome. That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the liuing God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature. For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil, Noli aliquem in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limis or circumscrib him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts thoughts and mindes; how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder his greivous Penall of a Painter, or the rustie And looother Instrument of a Carpenter or Carpenters?

For as this dishonour to the Infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Abel, so did the Deuill transport and spread this inuention into all the Regions adioyning and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the erection of the Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 70. yeeres; observing the Law of Numa (who brought impietie to resemble things most beautifully by things most base.) But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Gracians (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of the gods; which (as Augusine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vitiously condemned; and which Seneca thus dotheth; *Simulachra deorum uenerantur, illis supplicans, genua posita ad adorans, & cum hac suspiciant, fabros quaila fecere contemunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, whose they pray vnto with bended knees, whose they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handicraftsmen that made them: which also Seneca the Poet in this sort scoffed at:*

*Heu miser qui uana colunt, qui corde iuuistio
Religio a sibi sculptant simulachra suumq;
Faciem fugiant, & qua fecere uenerant.
Quis furor est? qua tanta animos dementia ludit?
Vt uolucrum, turpemq; bonem, toruamq; Draconem,
Semi-hominemq; canem, supplex homo propius adoret.*

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens mindes: that man should vgly shapes adore,
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile
Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Iewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorne the ignorant Ruditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inuicighed against Images: and Hesiodus, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witness, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Lyons neuer taught it the Lacedemonians, but though it impietie to represent immortal natures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his six Booke, de preparatione Euangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Crinus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might bee remembered that witness the disdaine which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hesiodus hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truly sayd, Omnia mala exempla bonis iniuria orta sunt, All ill examples haue sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memorie of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and Common-wealths; Effigies hominum (saith Plinie) non solabant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuam mentem: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to bee perpetually remembered. And though of the more ancient Papists, some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are proleptia literarum, ut per ea discerent homines Deum inuisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they) & lo before the Heathen said are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the inuisible God: in which vnderstanding perhaps they no otherwise esteemed them then pictures indeed, yet as that of Baal or Bel set vp in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most reuerenced Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled and cast away: so those very Rocks & Stones, and title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serennus hath somewhat like vnto this of Comester. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegiis suis artibus infectus, sciens, nullum se posse super his memorialium librum in Aram prorsus inferre iniqua erat comparsa iusto, &c. Cham (the sonne of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remaine with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in metall and hard stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laugh at his birth, when all other children weepe; which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he attained vnto: being taken for the Inuenter of naturall Magick and other Arts; for the Corrupter, to faith Plinie and Iustine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natiuities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and minerals, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldaea is also made the Inuenter. I rather thinke that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his sonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein then any other in that age, if hee exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisdom of after-times in this, that hee knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdom, which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and reneweth all.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouer-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie findes of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the middle of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Starres, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this Art had beene inuented by Zoroaster, hee could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne lifetime; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, he might adde somewhat to this kinde of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse angling about the word and arte of Magick. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zorastres was giuen: which by Hierodorus & Dinan seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of arte, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphilus, who liued in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hystanes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past threecore and eightene yeres. Suidas remembreth a fift, called Peromedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the sonne of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemilbivus or Pletho, Ficinus and Steuchius, make him a Chaldean. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Porphyrus makes the Chaldaei and Magi diuers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi & they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, hee saith, to be intitled, Patris Ezre Zoroastri, & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcrafts.

Now for Magick it selfe; which Arte (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligent, multi reprehendunt; Few vnderstand, and many reprehend; Et sicut Canes ignotos semper alitant; As Dogs barke at those they know not: to their condemne and hate the things they vnderstand not: I thinke it not amisse (leaving Ninus for a while) to speake somewhat thereof.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) because of Simon Magus: who being indeed, not Magus, but Gōēs, (that is) familiar with euill spirits, vsurped that title. For Magick, Coniuring, and Witcherie, are farre differing Arts, wherof Plinie being ignorant scotteth therat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found the arte after long studie and labour altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitively, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conuenant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Arte of Magick is the Arte of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word (saith, that the Persians called their gods magus: whence hee addeth that Magus is either εἰρηναῖος or δυσμενής (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the seruice of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Math. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kinde: which Piccolominie calleth the diuine Magick; and these did the Lauines newly intitled Sapientes or Wisen men: For, the feare and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisen men the Greekes call Philosophers: the Indians, Brachmans; among the Aegyptians they were termed Priests, with day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Aegyptians they were termed Priests, with the H. brewes they were called Cabalistes, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hystanes, one of the ancient Magicians) vseth these words: Et verum Deum merita maiestate persequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed re-ritus uenerationis nouit scilicet. Idem deaemonas prodit terrenis, uapor, humanitatis inimicus; Soisthenes (for so M. Felix calleth him, not Hystanes) ascribeth the due maiesty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath deliuered that there are Demis earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankind.

His Maiesty also in his first Booke of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine and heauenly sciences; but vniuilly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is also right which His Maiesty auoweth, that vnder the name of Magick all other vnlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Maiesty distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magick which His Maiesty condemneth, is of that kinde whereof the Deuill is a partie. Daniel in his second chapter nameth foure Kindes of those wise men: Arieli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldaei. Arieli the olde Latine translation calleth Sophistas; Vatubus and Panignius, Genethliacos, or physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatubus Naturalists: Nempē sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) diuinarum humanarumq. rerum scientiam proficentes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Græcians (that is) men that professe the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke and the English call them Inchanters, Iunius, Magicians, Catallion, Coniecturers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis, The wise men of Babel.

The second sort Vatubus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English, call Astrologers; Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kinde are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierome, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Vitiches, or Paysoners; in Iunius, Præstigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Paysoners; and that inderde there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any Arte of Magick or Necromancie vseth the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischiefe, His Maiesie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other means bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldaens: who took vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euents: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vaderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magick, hauing chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfet the highest and most noblest part of it, yet so as they haue also to creep into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Inuentor goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heauenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetike and Astronomie, who before Abrahams coming vnto them knew none of these sciences. ²⁰

And to doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Atirandula against Garfias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium praeantistimus Chaldaeos primum, deinde Phoenices, deum Aegyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & diuina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon asfirme, that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldaens, then the Phoenicians, lastly, the Aegyptian priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magick containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the babblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humane vse, Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Pertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort ³⁰ were Aritus, Arnoldus de villanova, Raymond, Racon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better vaderstood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus remembered by S. Hieronimo Paulinus, in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans; among the Italians, Thespian; among the Aegyptians, Hermes; among the Babylonians, Bu Ida; the Thracians had Zamolxis; the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris; and the Italians, Petrus Apopenfis. The Magick which these men profest is thus defined: Magia est conuersio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam compatiens sibi congruenter respondentibus, vt inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant; Magick is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by ⁴⁰ a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds which other men diuine into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesteth God to be the Creator of the Vniuersall: he beleueth of the Trinitie, which he could not inuigilate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approacheth the immortality of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Pellissus, Picinus, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phanicians, vsing Zoroasters owne words: Hic ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingenitus, expert partium, sibysis similitudo, bonorum omnium origo, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater vniuersi, sine doctrina iustitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacra natura vniuersi inuenitor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God the first incorruptible, euerglasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the only inuener thereof.

Sextus Senensis speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldaens, doth distinguish those wise men men into five orders, (to wit) Chasædum, or Chaldaens: Aphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he translates Arioli, or Sophists) Mechasphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Possioners; and Gazarim Augures, or Auspices, or Diuiners.

Chasædum were those which had the name of Chaldaens, which were Astronomers: Hic cælestium motus diligentissime spectantur; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Aphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam diuinorum quam humanarum rerum causis philosophantur: who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the sonne of Beor) to be the first: but Lactantius ascribeth the inuention of this arte to Zoroaster the Persian. ^{Lact. l. 2.}

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which hee received from his Ancesters.

Mechasphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we haue spoken already out of His Maiesies booke of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Auspices (after Saint Hierome) which diuine from the entrailes of beastes flaine for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vaderstand Augures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

Sextus Senensis in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magick, his owne words are these: Et ne quem moueat præuulgus Polychronij & Theophili testis, ^{Phil. l. 6. fol. 44.} monia, ciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram vbiq; ab Origine damnatam, quæ per se-dera cum demonibus iuncta aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ ad præctice naturalis philosophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium; ⁴⁰ ut has testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not moue any man, it is to be vaderstood that Magick is of two sorts, the one euery where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seeminglie) by couenants made with Deuils; the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practice part of naturall Philosophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and suffering reciprocally.

⁴⁰ This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries vppon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene these foure kinds of wise Men formerly remembered, hee vseth this distinction: Quos nos hariosos; cateruimus; (i. e. id est) incantatores interpretati sunt; videntur mihi esse qui verbis remperant; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine videntur & viciis; & sapientissimi corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldaicis Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consectudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quoque & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Dominij Saluatoris ipse primus mortuorum eius intellexerunt; & venientes sanctam Bethlehem adorauerunt puerum, stellæ desuper ostendente. They whom wee call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seeme to mee such as performe things by wordes; Magicians, such as handle euery thing philosophically; Witches, that vse blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldaens I take them to bee signified by the name of Coniecturers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their owne Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldaens: yea Kings and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art: whence at the nativite of the Lord our Saviour they first of all vaderstood his birth, and coming vnto holy Bethlehem did worship the Child: the Starre from above shewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is that of Asyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, forasmuch as the cause is not in our felues, this place denieth dispute.

§. IIII.

That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

Where it may be objected, that if such Diuinations as the Heathens commonly vsed were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange Resolutions; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldaea, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such kind of people God himselfe commanded to be slaine? To this, diuers answers may be giuen. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the King, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (saide the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with fleshe; and herein they confessed the power of the Euer-living God.

Secondly, it may be coniectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any euill or vnlawfull Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel periwaded the contrary, and called it a hasty iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had bene taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel mistak and forbad the execution of that iudgement, because it was vnjust. For howloeuer those men might deserve punishment for the practice of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceedd humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Diuell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture euery where of good with euill, of fall-hood with truth, of corruption with cleannesse and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Diuell in the Image of Baal, Ashtaroth, Chemoth, Iupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleue the most ancient and religious Historians) from obseruing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it chere wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heauen, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost virtues, sometimes taught by the Diuell, and applied by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable ends, can neuer terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the vsing of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Diuell betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of Dreames; so farre as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make vse of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as signes of good or euill successe) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crowes against Raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be giuen: For if we confound Arts with with the abuse of them, we shall not onely condemne all honest Trades and enterchange among men (for there are that deccie in all professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and couer it ouer with a most scornfull and begerly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) we should leaue our selues ingratos erga eos, qui labore curam, lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: *W*hich should shew our selues towards those, who with paines and care haue discovered vnto vs light in this light.

Indeed not onely these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant, but the Mathematicks also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned iudge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni fabili quatuor elucet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate: In the Glasse of the Mathematicks that Truth doth shine, which is sought in euery kinde of knowledge; not in an obscure image, but in a neere and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kindes of vnlawfull Magicke.

It is true that there are many Arts, if wee may so call them, which are couered with the name of Magicke: and esteemed abusively to be branches of that Tree, on whose root they neuer grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromantie or Goetia: and of this againe there are diuers kinds. The one is an Inuocation at the Graues of the dead, to whom the Diuell himselfe giues answer in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortall soules of men doe not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderstanding to the liuing: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the Graues.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of coniuering or of rayting vp Diuels, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distract, as they beleue that by terrible words they make the Diuell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Moule) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless, they forget that the Diuell is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodnesse, no, nor by the fearefull Word of the Almightie: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet resolute himselfe, that he can draw the Diuell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which Diuels seeme to vse, is but thereby to possesse themselves of the bodies and soules of those which raile them vp; as Hu Maestrie in his Booke forenamed hath excellently taught: That the Diuels obedience is only secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto, respectu; that is, vpon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can doe vpon those simple and ignorant Diuels, which inhabe ambitious imaginations; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come vncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their seruants and vassals, doe no way neede any such inforcement.

Or it may be that these Coniurers deale altogether with Cardans mortall Diuels, following the opinion of Rabbi Auernathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kinde of Diuels liued nor about a thousand yeeres: which Plutarch in his Treatise of Oracles confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true that the Diuels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies feare those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly maltreated. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when hee had lifted him vp in the Ayre, cast him headlong out of his clawes, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prankce at other times vpon his owne accord the Diuell played with Theodotus: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to haue bene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like successe had Budae, a principall pillar of the Manichean Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth: and for a manifest prooffe hereof we see it euery in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth: and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beaurie and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

His he did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had mastered Babylonia, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betwene it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellepont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the worke of Ninus, he left the World in the yeere thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeeres. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant vnto her the absolute soueraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenians, and others, speakes of five dayes. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greeks, then that it had any truth.

Howsoeuer Ninus came to his end, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because hee changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Ninine in Assyria. Iustin reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest her selfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her selfe to the people in the person of her sonne Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and vnder-taken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninias had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very vnlike that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeeres after by any such subtile (for so long she reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous government and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

Some Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue been of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Countie, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her Citie wherein she was borne, Semiramis Ascaloni; of Ascalon, the ancient Citie and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Dercesus, a Curtian of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Dercesus or Dercesus, the Mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the banke of a Lake adioyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man, she was by him made with childe, which (for feare of extreame punishment) she conuayed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beasts) the same was fed by certaine birds, which vsed to feede vpon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this childe, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to couer her dishonor and breach of vow, notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, and (as the Poets haue fained) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beaurie & humane shape. It is thought that from this Dercesus the inuention of that Idoll of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body: into into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained onely the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath conuerted that place, Parabius, Pagabius, and Taninus, write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a fish, and so it onely appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idoll representing Trition, one of those imaginarie Sea-gods vnder Neptunus. For this Citie being maritime: (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phenicia) vsed all their deuotion to Neptunus, and the rest of the pettie gods which attended him.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition vnto India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

If for her Pedigree, I leaue it to the Assyrian Heralds: and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Gracians. For delicacie and ease doe more often accompany licentiousnesse in men and women, then labour and hazard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princess more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the warres she made with glorious successe: all but her last enterprize of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she neuer returned: and that of all her most powerfull Armie there suruiued but onely twentie persons: the rest being either drowned in the Riuer of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Staurabates. But as the multitude which went out are more then reason hath numbered: so were those that returned lesse then could haue escaped of such an Armie, as consisted of foure millions and vppwards. For these numbers which she leuied by her Lieutenant Dercesus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Chariots armed with hooks on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all vses three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had euery man and beast but fed vpon grass) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Armie (though the same was farre inferiour to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the beliefe of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Armie of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the severall Prouinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soeuer the Armie of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowne by Staurabates vpon the banks of Indus, canticum cantant extremum: she sang her last song; and (as Antiquitie hath fained) was changed by the gods into a Doue (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gaue a Doue in their ensignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

Among all her other memorable and more then magnificent workes (besides the wall of the Citie of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this Citie, inuironed with a wall carryed foure square of great height and beaurie, hauing on each square certaine Brazen Gates curiously engraued. In the Core of the square there raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (making a Basis of a lesse circuit) three ft. a second Towre; and so eight in all, one above another, vpon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests fortieth three yeere of Ninus was the birth yeere of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeere after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeeres; others 352. yeeres betweene Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annius) makes but 250. yeeres from the flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeere of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeere of Abrahams birth was in the yeere after the flood 293, or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeere 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolued question and Labyrinth of time, it behooueth me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, & without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enue casteth at nouelty, than to goe on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, is to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuerfity.

§. II.

Apurpose of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

Hose which seek to proue this account of 292. yeeres, betweene the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scriptures: So Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lye, that Terah at 70. yeeres begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the sonne of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seuentieth yeere of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeere of Terah his age, then in the 131. 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeere, in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begot Abraham at 130. yeeres: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeeres.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

TO answer all which objections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me. Now for as much as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abrahams journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to search in to a strange tradition concerning his nauiailes, that serueth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling, which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a conceit, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when hee was called) obeyed God, so hee went out into a place which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and hee went out, not knowing whether he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serueth very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of S. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, Act. 7. 4. that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct, & plain, what force hath any mans fancie or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, & another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can picke any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from Heb. 11. 8. whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that hee be beleued in the rest. But that he performed the commendement of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourny into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes his aduersaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourny, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought him to despair, he had more cause then euer man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn nations: a Nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driuen to flee into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was olde, and hee had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himselfe for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuier of Euphrates, to trauell through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermion or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if he trauelled it twice; then was his iourny in all 1800. miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disproue this fancie; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more prooffe, that hee had not animus reuertendi, not any thought of looking backward, than any mans bare conceit, be hee of what antiquity or authority soeuer. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham tooke Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, & to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him, his wife, and kinsmen, and his and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was; or if he could haue bene there to moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his Father bene then alieue, he might haue hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and reliefe, then among the Aegyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the youngest 40. yeeres after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeeres olde should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed decaire of A. Abraham at one hundred yeeres? For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the yeere 2109: and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. sons 36. yeeres after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Noah, Obed, and Iesse, who lived so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begat sonnes at 100. yeeres, or nere it, it cannot be marvailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and seven yeeres after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from v. e. Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

If followeth now to speake something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age together in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. yeeres old. For Abrahams age being made uncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnkil we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeere of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that Saint Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terah: which knowne, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not withheld by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nachor and Haran, were they Idolaters or other wife. For Nachor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Isaac: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Mileah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and Mother to Isaac: Mileah also the wife of Nachor, and mother of Bethuel, was Isacols great grand-mother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a son at 90. yeeres, and when by nature she could not haue conceiued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nachor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and Isacols, Leas and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child of Nachor: It was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of their mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Ios. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleueed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Country, and Citie of Urin in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, eie they left Chaldea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nachor also, who remained at Charran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Isacols, his owne kinsmen: he himselfe hauing also married in his owne familie: not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleueed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he inuited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Gen. 24. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100. Come in, thou blessed of Iehouah, &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said; This thing is proceeded of Iehouah: meaning that it was the wil of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, goe that she may be thy Masters sons wife, even as Iehouah hath said. This their often vling of the name of Iehouah, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chrysostome, and some latter writers, as Caictan, Olesiter, Masculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleueed in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledged the God of Abraham and of Nachor, and he called Abrahams seruant, blessed of I E H O V A H, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that he was the eldest: together with diuers reasons prouing that Abraham was not the eldest sonne of Terah.

In the maine obiection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strue to shorten the times, endeavour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proue at all that he was the eldest and first borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Juda and Ioseph of Jacob; nor Dauid the eldest of Iesse; nor Salomon of Dauid: as is formerly remembered. But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio futurae dignitatis: in qua excellit Abraham. The order of natiuitatis is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so it is here, where it is said, that Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget sonnes, him selfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 20. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enoch Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahaleel at 70; Mahaleel tered at 60; Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellencie he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Eieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentie, quatinus Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellencie, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. *Pietas ergo vel ipsa potius electio diuina, quae committitur iuxta pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare. Pietie, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth euer more drayn with it or after it, pietie and the feare of God, gaue place and precedencie to Semo among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.*

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had liued 86. yeeres. It was Gen. 12. 4. at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consummed 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he refused Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifest that hee parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if Abraham Terah commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it, Nor fauour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers haue approued it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add this much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of iudgement, that the best approued Historians, Diuine and prophane, labour to inuestigate the truth of times, thereby to approue the stories, and forpast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudgement to our selues, which of those two accounts giue the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, & those which follow him, who makes but 292. yeeres, or thereabouts, betwene the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeeres betwene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to bee the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeere of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeeres. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not hastily satisfie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiared doe slothfully and drowily sit downe; we shall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it about 1072. yeeres betwene the Flood and Abraham's birth: then to take away any part of those 352. yeeres giuen. For if we aduicely consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea before Abraham was borne, wee shall finde that it were very ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over-deeply betwene Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too neere the quick, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleede thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiectiō can approach it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Augusline, That wherefoeuer any one place in the Scriptures may bee conceiued disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-vnderstood. For in Abraham's time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the World besides, as farre as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and maruailes? giuing all strength thereby to common caviillers, and to those mens pilsh braines, who only bend their wits to finde impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and Mankind.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alleadged, I conclude, that from the generall Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeeres were consumed: and taking the Assyrian History with vs, the same number of yeeres were spent from the Flood to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeere of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeeres, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeeres to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, wee may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Reghu at 30. Reghu Seng at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Sabia, Raama and Sabecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augusline approueth. Giuing then 30. yeeres more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeeres to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeeres were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparifon: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Reghu in the same yeere of his life.

Let vs then allow 60. yeeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly finde people to build Babel: for sure wee are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeere they arrived in Shinar, whereof there are 6. yeeres remaining) we may giue them for their travels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattell: and as some ancient writers haue conceiued, and Bezanus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaine sides, for feare of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Augusline approueth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeeres of the 352. from the Flood to Abraham's birth: which number of 114. needesse bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure it we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeareouer-short. For Nimrod, by this, accomplished in all but one hundred twenty nine yeeres: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the sonne of Arphaxad the sonne of Sem, liued four hundred three yeeres: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne, Ninus reigned 9. yeeres: which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his Successor. Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. yeeres, and died in the 52. yeere complet of Abraham's life.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeeres, in the second yeere of whose reigne Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85. yeeres olde, hee rescued his nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeeres, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeeres after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeere of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to haue beene this Ninias the sonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeere as aforesaid, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeere of Abraham, and the 33. yeere of his owne reigne: after which he reigned five yeeres: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we haue set them downe, according to the times noted by Moses in the storie of Abraham, it is most certaine; vnlesse we will either derogate from the truth of Ninus and Semiramis computation, which were impietie: or account the whole Historie of Ninus and Semiramis to bee but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fables.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew: Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the reigne of Ninias Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to asseme what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe is most probable, is that which hath beene already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other then our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Babylon, and overthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the successour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abraham's life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassalls of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, Twelve yeeres were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated ouer Tigris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no 10 great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel bene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not haue needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphels,) yet this makes not the coniecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) receiued a downe right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betwene India and the Phenician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

§. X.

Of Arioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof hee is said to haue bene King, lies betwene Coele Syria and Arabia Petraea.

NOW the two other kings ioyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal: the one King of Ellas, the other of the Nations. For Ellas, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should bee Hellepont: which opinion Peterius fauoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, or so Hellepont farre distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petraea, or into Idumaea, which Countries these foure King chieflly inuaded: 30 Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but viced all the Art they had to inuite Craus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could bee more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodome, Bisha King of Gomorra, Shinar King of Admath, and Shemebar King of Zebosim, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kinde of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning; of 40 which Canaan had three and thirtie, all slaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to haue inuaded, bee imagined to haue bene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weakenesse in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alleadged for an example, that diuers Kings farre off, came to assist Pompey against Cesar: yet these fame examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither leade nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these pettie Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cesar, and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull then feare- 50 full: But the whole Countrie by these foure Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betwene Jordan and the mountainer of Seir: inclosed by the riuer of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybannu on the North, consisting of the two smal Prouinces of Trachonitis or Bajan, and the Region of the Maabites: a conquest farre vnualueable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus & Semiramis, who subiected al the great kings of that part part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellas for Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to ioyn with the Assyrians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellas at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Aike did rest, so doe they in this place retain the Hebrew word Ellas, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Peterius himselfe remembereth other opinions farre more probable then this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Vrbius a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas 10 in the border of Coele Syria: and S. Hierome callth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Coele Syria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King: who formerly ioyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same famili; and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who 20 was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that wee finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his armie, & the principall Commander vnder him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who area Nation of Persians bordering Assyria; according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betwene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that houle (knowne by the name of Arius, Arioch, Aretas, or Aretas) had the gouernment of that Persian Province called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the 30 same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch here spoken of may with more reason bee taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all from that sidetowards the West vnto Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne houle, and blood: which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

HE fourth King by Abraham ouerthrowne was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Goyim, which Atabulus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt 40 people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation: Peterius out of Strabo, findes that Galilee was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant: Sicut Strabo lib. 16. 581 are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilee was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Cananite was then in the Land, howsoever 50 they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not, But there are many pettie kingdoms adioyning to Phenicia, and Palestina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicea, Apamena, Chalcedice, Castrois, Chalibonissus, and all these doe also ioynethemselues to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselues together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest coniecture.

§. XII.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

ASsly, whereas it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperour, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provinciall gouernour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Paterius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldaea, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kider, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings wore on their heads.

Neither doe I beleue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this inuasion, and my reasons are these: First, example: and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-look what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire did at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tamerlain conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioyned a short life: and whatsoeuer things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, inuaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, then her Paramour: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vncxampled. But her soune hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those Kings adioyning (whose subiection, and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successe. For in regno Babylonicu incipit parum resplenduit, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it is that the necks of mortall men hauing bene neuer before galled with the yoke of foraine dominion, nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slaue: no long descent hauing as yet inuested the Assyrian with right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand: the foolish and effeminate soune of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had vsed before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeeres, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that hee so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indououred to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keepe what he could not without contentions perill enioy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall: make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained againe to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trauaile vpon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldaea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yere of Ninus, when Abraham obeying the voyce of God, tooke this great iourney in hand: in which time of 23. yeeres after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recouered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis Armeie of foure millions, with her selfe vnterly consumed in India, and all her armies and engines of warre, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest foules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, inuaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not bene revolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arius recouered one part, so did Balens or Balaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Aegypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes id est, Victor, et triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vnder takings had bene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bene gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

THe consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusall, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellows, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intitled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must to be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may wee otherwise conceiue this Historie: remouing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue bene vnwilling to finde, because they could not finde how to resolve them. For as it had bene a strange coniecture to thinke that Arius was drawne to assist the Persian, against the Sodomites, as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlike that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue bene once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldaea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Townes, whose very names how they should come to his eare, being disioyned by so many great Nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Ellasar, and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependants: what reason can wee finde that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorah? and when he should haue sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Townes, leauing Tyrrus and Sidon, & the great Citie of Damascus, with many other places of much importance, and farre neerer vnto him, vnsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alleged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it bene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, then that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more then madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betwene Euphrates, yea betwene themselves and the river of Indus?

Indus: Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should finde no great wisdom, if he knowing the weaknesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Countie, was not sufficient to counteruaile one moneths charges of so huge an armie. How small did he must his valour haue beene, who with so mighty preparations effected no more then the wasting of that Valley, wherein he leste the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countie, although he had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this inuasion (supposed to be great) make any fearefull matter: but compose the two armies as equally match, saying they were foure kings against five: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall finde that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Nimias, who liued foure or five yeeres longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Historie haue forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these foure kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders every one of his owne company, which he carried forth as a Colone, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might con- sort together, and make the weakest of the Countie which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations; in the infancy of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many kings as feue- rall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusall, for the leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make al- liances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. This Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the sloathfull qualitie of Nimias then reigning in Assyria: whose vnnimlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vnder-taking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed, in the reigne of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remaine at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthy than themselves, were aduanced. If the con- sent of the whole streame of wagers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Nimias: and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferior to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not suffice, we may lay that Amraphel was an Vnder king or Sa- traps of Shinar, vnder Nimias: who may be supposed to haue had, his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Ninieue: and to haue preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom he hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, that these foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countie named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countie themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereby added that Chedorlaomer seemes rather we called a Persian King, then King of Persea: and that Arach (whose kingdome vndoubtedly was betweene Sy- ria and Arabia) having beene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captiues or Persian Kings: (whose suchlike things here to vnderstand, with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to haue so high a place vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intention to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of the opinions, or any other, if he finde any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countie or people foure these foure were Kings, this expedition is the only publishing reason that we

we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sonnes, and of his Nephews Esam and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, be- cause it is not our purpose, either to stand vpon things generally knowne to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath beene elsewhere already spoken, nor to preuent our selues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we passe them here in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Aegypt: by which it appears that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a seled and flourishing kingdome; it will not be amisse in the next place to speake somewhat of the antiquities, and first kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Aegypt from the first peopling of it after the • Flood, to the time of the deliuerie of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A briefe of the names and times of the first Kings of Aegypt: with a note of the causes of diffi- culty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Some after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (hauing doublelesse knowne the fertili- tie of Aegypt before the Flood) came thither and tooke posses- sion of the Countie; in which they built many Cities: and be- ganne the kingdome one hundred ninie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouernours of this Kingdome till such time as Israel departed Aegypt, are shewne in the Table fol- lowing.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.
1847.	191.	Cham.
2008.	352.	Osiris.
2269.	613.	Typhon.
		Hercules.
2276.	620.	Orus.
2391.	735.	Sesostris the great.
2424.	768.	Sesostris the blinde.
2438.	782.	Busris or Oris the second.

2488.	832.	Rathoris or Athoris.
2497.	841.	Chencres drowned in the red Sea.

The Table and especially the Chronologie is to be confirmed by probabilities and con- iectures, because in such obscurity, manifest and restlesse truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Aegyptian Kings: which he would not haue done, if they had not beene more vncertaine then the Sicyonian, whom he remembreth, then whom doublelesse they were more glorious: One great occasion of this obscurity in the Aegyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Priests: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings, and recounted vnto stran- gers, the names of many Kings that neuer reigned. What ground they had for these re- ports of supposed Kings, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is that the magnificent works and and royall buildings in Agypt, such as are neuer found but in States that haue greatly flourished, witnesseth that their Princes were of marueilous greatnesse: and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Agyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Agyptians, and publishing in their owne name, such as pleased them best; haue confirmed them, and as it were enforced them vpon vs, by their authority. A third and general cause of more than Agyptian darkenesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Anniius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may add mine) I thinke thus; That Anniius hauing scene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what he would, may be credited, is an auoucher of true Histories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogies of the Agyptian Kings, runs thre altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Anniius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Agyptian Dynasties, and otherwise it appears that Chams reigne in Agypt began in the yeere after the Flood, 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controuersie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authoritie of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each 43. yeere of Ninus: vnder the twelue, which were called the greater gods: so that all the yeeres of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynasty endured fourteene yeers: the fourteenth 26. the fiftteenth 37. These three last, are said to haue bene vnder the three yonger Gods. So the fiftene first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeeres. As I doe not therefore beleuee that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath bene mentioend, because Anniius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot rectifie the account vpon this onely reason, that Anniius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the yeere of Abrahams birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summe of 161. yeeres, which according to our account were spent in the fiftene former, being subducted out of the sum of 352. yeeres, which were betwene the Flood and Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynasty, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Agypt, was in the yeere 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankinde which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Ann. diluio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeeres, as Glicas recordeth: whose report I haue elsewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wiues, Children, Cattell, and substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred fcutenrie one yeeres had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Agypt, we allow twenty yeeres: and these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeeres after the Flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Agypt, and settling there, make vp the summe of 191. yeeres; at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Agypt, in the beginning of the first Dynasty. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if we add the 161. yeeres of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, we shall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth, which was Ann. dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needs haue bene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their seuerall times times about 161. yeeres: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Agypt haue bene peopled as soone as Babel after the Flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinke) must haue bene before the Flood. That the arrivall at Babel was many yeeres before the plantation of Agypt, after the Flood, enough hath bene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-lived generations betwene Adam and the Flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue bene as well after the Flood, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrey erect such forme of Policie, as had bene vled in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, of times many vnder one King.

HE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not seuerall races of Kings, as the vaunting Agyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitution of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest prooff, That it was the manner of the Agyptian Kings, to put the government of the Countrey into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, onely reseruing the Soueraignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Vizier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue bene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Agypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoste, though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not he the sonne of Ierubbaal? and Zebul is his Officer? Also Ishobab the sonne of Saul, feared Amer the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Dauid himselfe hating Ioshabab for his crueltie, did not punish him in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite living then in Agypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idleness and pleasure, to haue laid the burden of government vpon others; and vpon icalousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. About all other prooffs is the advancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph: Only in the Kings throne will I be about thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land William, Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirms that the like or very same forme of government of Viceroy, was in his time practised in Agypt, hauing there bene in vyle (as he beleued) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Agypt were not Lords of the Countrey, how euer they haue bene so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill government, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office & authority royall into the Soldans hands. He that shall reade in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Muley Elhadach, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Ioseph was, though farre inferior in wisdom.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the List of the Agyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Ioseph brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey: Besides, it is Gen. 42. 30. not unlikely that the vainglorious Agyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of

of importance, and royall managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himselfe intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Tosaphs brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say, Diodorus, that Sesofstris was the nineteenth King after Menus; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menus: which could not have beene, if Menus had beene Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many kindred lineages or sorts of men. Now by whatlocuer means a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royall alwaies passed by descent, and not by election: which besides consent of Authors the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the land of Aegypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby either have beene inthralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor: or inioying their Fathers land, though not his estate, have beene more mighty then the King: as Land-lords of all Aegypt, and the King himselfe their Tenant. Likewise we finde in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Egypt it is said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the ancient King.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

That the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Aegypt is called in the Scripture, the land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the posterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Pute, or Canaan, as well as Aegypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris leth himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying, Nihil patris Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchre generosi ortum: which must needs be understood of Cham: for this Saturnus Aegyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Aegyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Aegypt, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierome in questionibus Hebraicis saith, that the Aegyptians themselves did in his dayes call their Countrey Ham: as in foure severall places in the Psalms this Countrey is called the land of Cham. And Orius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Aegyptians this Countrey of Aegypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: ut puto (saith he) à Chamo Nemo filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Aegyptum usq. hodie Aegyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: that Aegypt unto this day in the tongue of the Aegyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alleadged, which I have already given in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Sem liued 600: Arphachshad and Shelah each about 400. But strange it had beene, if one Salus created by Manchea, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Baon, Apachnas, Apochu, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus, and Sesofstris. Reineccius in hissor. Italia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith he was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitie and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Aegypt, and Reineccius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Aegypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language, Mexae. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where precisely set downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities: That hee is not vainly said by Annus his Berosus, to have begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebes began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who

anoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie, I can well beleue, assenting so farre to Reineccius, who thinks the Dynasties were named only according to the severall seats of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Aegypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Osiris.

He death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lehabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybius, made warre in Italy, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeere of Baleus King of Affrya: before which yeere he had made many great warres in Aegypt, Phancia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and having ended his Aegyptian warres, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus farre Berosus, or authors following perusius. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were tiled) held the Kingdom of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon inferres, that sixe yeeres may be allowed to the warres, in which Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Aegyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris have beene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 197. yeeres. I thinke that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholler in Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would have beene required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doublelesse) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had beene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel have come into Aegypt but seven yeeres before the death of Osiris: and have liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleueed. For it was the same king who advanced Ioseph, bade him fend for his Father; and gaue him leave to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funerall: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reigne of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seventh yeere of Israels coming into Aegypt: we must needs cut off 23. yeeres from that number, which Krentzhemius coniectures his reigne to have continued: namely seven which hee should have liued after Iacobs coming into Aegypt; nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming: and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Iosephs advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is said to have indured 10. yeeres: After which proportion we may well giue not onely sixe yeeres, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeeres, which passed betwene the time of Iosephs being sold into Aegypt, vnto his advancement: considering that Puiphar who bought him, & whose daughter he may seeme to have married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to have beene, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Aegypt, as the tyrannous vsurpation of Typhon must needs have brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Puiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the sonne of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioseph, and finding him a iust man, and one vnder whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Iosephs hands, than vnto any of his Aegyptian followers (many of whom he had found either fall-harred, or weak and vnclucky in the troublesome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further and say, That when the saying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants; then Puiphar Priest of Om, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, and his iniurious imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife, and being old, resigned his office of chiefe Steward vnto him; who afterward in regard of Puiphar, did fauour the Priests, when he bought the lands of all other Aegyptians. This might appeare to some a rule not

valike to the frierly booke of Athenas, Paiphars daughter: but vnto such as consider that God workes vually by meanes: and that Paiphars was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Iacob died: it would seeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should haue spent 42. yeeres after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italie, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian was considered, and his former enterprises and achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against vs, but for vs: or if it were against vs, yet could it not weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the vndisputable truth of Scripture doe confirme it. Neuerthelesse I freely grant that all these proofes are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, nor well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, and answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Egyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sesostres.

Concerning the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I finde none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giueth three yeeres to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is to peremptorie without prooffe, as it his owne word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alledging no witnesse, but as it were saying, Tell me this: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did verry soone vndertake his Fathers reuenge: and was not long in performing it: and that leauing Egypt to his brother, he followed other warres, in the same quarrell, as hath bene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Auentinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleue it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, seuen yeeres were spent, howeouer diuided betweene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seuen yeeres after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set downe his reasons, which in a matter so probable I thinke he wanted not. Now where as he alloweth 90. yeeres of the eighteenth Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seemeth that the reign of Orus lasted 115. yeeres. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeeres by our account: who (according to Berosus and others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham 352.

From that time to the ¶ vocacion of Abraham 75.

which summe diuers other wayes may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there doe remaine (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeeres from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed vnto Sesostres or Sesosthis: who is placed next vnto Orus, by authority of the Scholiastes Apollonij: not without good probability. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Asia: to haue built a fleet of ships on the red Sea, to haue passed into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle-earth Seas, to haue passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations: This is he (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Iustine erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Iustine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sesosthis, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient then was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether vnlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, tooke Gerar, and gaue it to his daughter: (as wee may reade more at large in the holy historie of the Bible) after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho sought passage through the land of Israel, when hee made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesosthis. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as he came into Iuda with with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaueth it vndecided; vnlesse it be sufficient prooffe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sesosthis next to Orus: following the Scholiastes Apollonij. But further answer may be made to them that they were not one. For, as Iustine witnesseth, Sesosthis, otherwise Vexoris, made warre on people farre removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came vp purposely against Hierusalem. Sesosthis, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse: Sesac had 60000. Sesosthis had 8020. Chariots, Sesac but 1200. Sesosthis made his expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose then to succour Ieroboam, and giue him countenance in his new reign: whom he had liuoured euen against Salomon: therefore Sesosthis must needs haue reigned whilest Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moueth me nothing. For Osiris did succcede those fifteene gods, namely, the twelve greater, and three lesser: himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Meneus, and Menis, were titles of dignitie: though mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Amercius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician, which name Tex-maximus might well be attributed to Osiris, who was a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giuing good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In powerfull and great vndertakings Sesosthis was no whit inferior to Osiris. For he sought victory not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royall disposition, leauing them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soone vpon his returne he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which hee was, being by his owne brother purposely fired: which neuerthelesse he is said to haue escaped, and to haue reigned in all thirte three yeeres: after which time he chose rather to die then to liue; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sesosthis left a sonne, whose name was Pheron or Pherones: who afterwards tooke the name of Sesosthis; but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blinde. The cause of his blindness: Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the Riuier Nilus with a iaueline: which tale Diodorus hauing likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he tooke the disease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where exprest: yet forasmuch as Orus the second, (otherwise Busris) who succeeded him, began 14. yeeres after that this Sesosthis had bene king, it must needs be that this reigned 14. yeeres at least. That Busris began not vntill these 14. yeeres at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Busris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt plainly shewes, being almost generally agreed vpon, to haue bene 25. yeeres. That none came betwene Sesosthis the second and Busris or Orus the second, it stands onely vpon probabilities: which are these. After Sesosthis had reigned somewhile, he fell blinde: after certaine yeeres he recovered his sight, as is said: which may haue bene true, but is more like to haue bene a fable: surely the manner of his recovery as it is set downe, is very fabulous: namely that by looking vpon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne husband, he got his sight againe. As the time of his reign, before his blindness, and when he was well againe (if euer he were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeeres: so his workes which were great, doe much more strongly argue, that his reign was not very short. His words are largely set downe by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may seeme to haue bene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and flues of Nilus: whom I thinke he rather frightened, (as his Father had done) with spades and shouls, then with darts, and iauelins; and by his diligent ouer-sight of that worke, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples loue; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Busiris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queene Thermutis that tooke vp Moses out of the water.

Nnd herein (if I may presume to coniecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king, is like to haue dealt with him, as Ieroboam did with the sonne of Salomon. For that Busiris himselfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, it well appeared, by the drudgerie wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesoftris, as Ieroboam was by Salomon, in the ouertight of those businesse, he had good opportunitie to worke his greatnesse with the king by industry: and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king: as Ieroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: vnlesse hee haue either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreouer he sought to deriue all the paine and labour of publique workes from the Aegyptians, to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his owne people was very plausible: who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slacke in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busiris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers, who also thinke: that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinke him Author of the bloody edict. Neuertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne five yeeres after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Hunting thinkes to haue lasted 87. yeeres, ere the departure out of Aegypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesoftris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroges in Aegypt was; & how great confidence the kings did put in them; seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Aegypt, and all the Aegyptians for bread; giuing at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Aegyptians cried out vpon Pharaoh, for bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph; what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately felicit out of prison, a king well able to haue gouerned himselfe, would giue such trust, & soueraigne authority, it is not vnlike that a blind Prince should doe it to a man of especiall reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdom to him, though his reigne was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesoftris. But whether Busiris did vlturpe the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busiris were onely Regent, whilst the king liued, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel, seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesoftris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, vsing at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeeres which passed betweene the beginning of Sesoftris his reigne, & the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remaine, are to be accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeeres, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors herein approue. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeeres: Her name was Thermutis Pharciu, or Muthis according to Cedrenus; Euseb. calls her Athenais: & out of Artabianus his History Meris; Ioseph calls her both Aencheres, & Thermutis. Epphanius in Panario saith that shee was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenophis, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius & others: but but whether he were a king or onely a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesoftris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Aegyptians called rather the neece or grand-child, then the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesoftris, and the disreputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any tide by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was shee both daughter, grand-child, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and suruiuing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeeres. But if she were daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

HHe had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Athoris, who succeeded her, the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius; but his linage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned nine yeeres: after whom Cheneres, thought to be his sonne, reigned ten yeeres, and then perished in the red Sea. During the reigne of Cheneres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon 10: of which Historie elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Cheneres (whom some call Aencheres: but all or most doe stile Cheneres, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeeres; and then Cherres 15. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Aegypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not vnlike: viz. That Aegypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the later of whom, or his posterity seemes to haue taken all 30: from Cherres the grand-child of Cheneres. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned foure yeeres after Cherres: and Armeis one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne said to haue bene five yeeres. His name is called Armeus, otherwife Danau: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Italia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Aegyptus or Ramefess who gaue name to the Countie, hauing expelled his brother Danau, reigned, and begat Lyncus, inarrited to Hypermetra.

Danau or Armeus expelled by his brother Aegyptus, after hee had reigned five yeeres, became king of Argas in Greece: was Father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephewes sons of Epaphus should haue occupied the kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himselfe is reported by Eusebius to haue bene borne in the time of Cheneres. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danau & Aegyptus, otherwife called Armeus and Ramefess, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-child of Cheneres. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the Historie of these two brethren, Danau and and Aegyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sonnes: perhaps, or rather questionlesse by diuers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armenus or Danaus did succcede Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five yeeres. Rameffes followed, who reigned 68. yeeres. This Rameffes or Aegyptus is that Armesefimamum or Armesefimianus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Moses was borne: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercator's opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Goe, retorne to Aegypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceiues, that it was one and the same king vnder whom Moses was borne, and vnder whom he slew the Aegyptian at the 40. yeere of his age: and fled into the wildernesse, and there abode for feare: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameffes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Aegyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeeres more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successeours from Themos (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downewards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betwene Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Moses borne vnder Armesefimamum: and Israel deliuered in the dayes of his sonne Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seemes to him with little alteration to sound like Pharates, of which name one was thought to haue flourished either as a king, or a wife man about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable workes: yet my assent herein is withheld from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Chenckes was King who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be vnderstood of Basris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, Saint Cyrril in his first booke against Julian the Apostata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeeres old: Rameffes, which was this Armesefimamum, being then king of Aegypt. After Rameffes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeeres: who is thought by Mercator and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laied open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and here to speake of that great deliuerance of Israel out of Aegypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly ouerpasse.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliury of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

Rue it is that the Historie it selfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are verie neere as many, as the men that haue written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his annotations vpon Saint Augustine citeth very many of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses liued in the time of Semiramis: but it hee did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrarie to all Stories Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued, shee commanded Syria, and all the parts there of absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion hee remembreth of Apion, taken from Ptolomie a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argiues, and Ames in Aegypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke Historie the first booke: that Moses was borne while: Apis the third King ruled Arges.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who though hee cite some authorities, that Moses liued after the Troian warre, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, prouing it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth downe the testimonie of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Musaeus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confessed that Moses was called Musaeus, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Aegypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothos. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses vir Deo conuinctissimus is called Musaeus Iudaeorum. Eusebius in his Chronologie, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Aegypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which liued at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thomosis: the same perelance which Apion the Grammarian will haue to bee Amosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Seihosis: to whom Lysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gaue the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus called also Spherus or Iphereus, gouerned Affyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Crius the Argiues; that then (Scythia the second ruling in Aegypt) Moses was borne. For if wee beleue S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduardus Mofes ex Aegyptio populum Dei nouissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium regis: Mofes (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proued. S. Augustine affirmes (as before remembred) that Moses was borne: Saphrus gouerning Affyria: and that hee left Aegypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeeres; his successeor Mamelus 30. yeeres; Sparetus after him 40. yeeres: in whose fourth yeere Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Afcadades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Affyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Crius Argos (for these three kings liued at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Aegypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yeere of the Affyrian Saphrus: for take one yeere remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeeres of Mamelus, melus, and the 40. yeeres of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three yeeres of Cecrops: his 50. yeeres: then take nine yeeres out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparetus successeur, those nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Aegypt: and adde these nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50: and so it falleth right with S. Augustinus words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Aegypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppressed in Aegypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine yeeres before the birth of Moses, & 54. yeeres, or rather more, after Ioseph: betweene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeeres: some of which time, and 80. yeeres after, they lived in great sterilitie and miserie. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters ouer them, to keepe them vnder with burdens: and they built the Cities, Pithom and Ramases, &c. And by crueltie they caused the children of Israel to serue; and made them weary of their liues, by sore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vpon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wilddome of God appointed: euen from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when he last lasted 2370. yeeres, to the eightieth yeere of Moses, and vntill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which hee performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Chodman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliuer of Aegypt, may the better be vnderstood, I thinke it necessary to speake a few words of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Aegypt, mentioned in this storie, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

His Citie which the Hebrewes call Zoan, was built seven yeeres after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie, the Septuagint, Tanis, Iosephus, Protaids after the name of an Aegyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of Thanis; Eusebius, Thama; and William Tyrtius, Tapis. It adioyneth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, where in Jeremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Aegyptian and Iewish Idolatry.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Aegypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not vnlily to be same Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Arianus affirmeth, that Abraham did reade Astronomie in Helopolis, or On, to Phereates King of Aegypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Aegyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Helopolis. Paginus, Vatablus, Iunius, and our Englishe call it On, and Pisulanie, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Aegypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nelus falling into the Sea at Pelusium. And it may be that Helopolis to the South of the river Traian, was the same which Vatablus and our Englishe call Auen. Of the latter it is that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same, which Pomp. Mela, and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrtius in the Holy Warre, Malbee; the Arabians, Bahabeth; and Simon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Helopolis, or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adioyning Jacob inhabited, while hee liued in Aegypt. In the confines of this Citie, Omar, the high Priest of the Jewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferiour to that of Hierusalem (Psolomie Philopater then gouerning in Aegypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. yeeres after the foundation by Omar, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth, herein to haue fulfilled a prophetic of Esaie. c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terra Aegypti; In stat day shall the Altar of the Lord bee in the midst of the Land of Aegypt. Antiochus Epiphaneus at that time of the building tyrannizing ouer the Jewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Aegypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Iesu remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (saith Brochard) the fountain taine is still found, called Iesum Well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Aegypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Aegypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembred by Esaie and Ezekiel, the same which Herodotus calleth Noph: which later name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, so called, which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great Citie, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowen to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabur; and Tudalenis Micram.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Paginus, Iunius, and our Englishe write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Daniela, as Gal. Tyrtius wittnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrtius) quae olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium.

The Citie of No, the Septuagint call Diopolis. Of which name there are two or three in Aegypt. Hierome conuerts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Babylus, (for so Hierome and Zeigler doe write it) is the same which the Hebrewes call Pitheth.

To make the storie the more perceiueable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Helopolis or Beisphos, Balsaphon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Deserts of Arabia the Sonie. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retaine, what wee reade, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driuen to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arianus Maximus; who in his Preface to the storie of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res gestae narrentur, aut sine Topographica cognitione historia legantur, adeo confusa atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non elucrum, nihil non difficile elici possit; si narratione (saith he) bee made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories bee read without Topographicall knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficultie.

§. III.

Of the crueltie against the Israelites young children in Aegypt: and of Moses his preservation, and education.

But to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slauey, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented pauerie, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soone as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, qua praerant (saith Commettor) multitudini obsecraticum, who had command giuen them ouer all mid-wiues; by whom (as it seemeth) hee gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the mid-wiues of Aegypt together, had bene a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrewes, or of the Aegyptians, it is diuersly disputed. S. Augustinus calls them Hebrewes, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Aegypt commended the Mid-wiues of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Ambrosius, and Peregrinus beleeue them to be Aegyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witness both the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with pietie, & the feare of God, commanded commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affording them the iustice, which every King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might have employed or sent away at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrewes there should be borne a childe; who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrary to the lawes of Heauen and of nature) he stretched out his bloudie and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuentiō Ierod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue bene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtred. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future iustesse, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the first of Exodus: Comis vs worke wisely with them, lest they multiplie; and it come to passe, that if there be warre, they ioyne themselves vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. And ioyne themselves vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. And we see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdome of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they reffe on the inuentions of their owne: most lesse, and altogether darkened understanding. For euen by the hands of the dearly beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods maruellous workes taken out of Nilus, being therein turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infante. And this Princeesse hauing beheld the childe his forme and beautie, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as shee did not onely preferre it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be suckled as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, shee called the childe Moses, as it were, extractus, or eruptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Iosephus and Glicus, Moy, a voyce expressing water, and hyses, as much to say, as that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised, before hee was put into the Arke of Reedes, & that Amram his father had named him Ioachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, & at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educant, prescitis et sapientibus Aegyptiorum Magistris, à quibus eruditur, with Basil, vnto whom shee gaue princely education, appointing ouer him wise Masters of the Aegyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Aegyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen, in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisdome of the Aegyptians. Which wisdome or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, wee haue added, betweene the death of Moses, and the reigne of Iosua.

§. IIII.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre in Aethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastoral life: and that of Peterius of the Bookes of Genesis and Iob.

When Moses was growne to mans estate, Iosephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeeres warre that he made against the Aethiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses, called Aterae; and how he recovered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a daughter of Aethiopia, whom he tooke to wife. So hath Commeilior a prettie tale of Moses. How after the end of that warre, Tharbis redifiting his returne into Egypt, Moses most skillfull in Astronomie, caused two Images to be engrauen in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memorie; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of obliuion, to his wife Tharbis, refering the other of memorie for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulness, after shee had a while worn, began to neglect the loue shee bare her husband: and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leauing these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeere of Moses age, when hee beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moued by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred vp by disdain against the other, in the contention hee slew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, whose chosen seruant hee was, he fled into Arabia Petraea, the next bordering Countrie to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vnkowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few sheep, & the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occasion whereby to prouide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countrie neere Egypt, fittest to returne from: necessarie to be knowne, because intertiant betwene Egypt and Iudaea, through which hee was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best serued. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Desarts, there the glorie of God, which shineth most, couered him ouer, and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopte childe of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a mecke and humble sheepe-head, sitting at a mountaines foot; a keeper and commander of thole poue beasts onely.

In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, he consumed 40. yeeres. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flockes, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desert hee enioyed himselfe: and being separate from the preasse of the world, and the troublefome affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all thole knowledges, whereof his younger yeeres had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also iudging, that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principallie, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi praeludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, regis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia praeexercent in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia et bello perfectura sunt; brutis praevenitibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero praefectura mansueti pecoris, habet quidam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoque Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contumeliae sed honoris gratia. The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introduction to exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Even as warlike natures doe before hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wilde beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the gouernment of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subjects; therefore, Kings are stiled sheepe-heads of thole people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob was at that time liuing. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion. That Moses while hee liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the booke of Genesis; although I cannot denie the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assistance of their deliuerie from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Of this calling backe into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the mannailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that hee was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first foureene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name hee should make him knowne, and by whom he was sent; hee received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euer-being nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be understood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the Eternall: which truly is, which is aboue all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment;

ment; neuer continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in euery thortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. *Vna est Dei & sola natura quæ verè est: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliunde, sed summum est. Cetera quæ creata sunt, etiam si videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit. It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is; for hee hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not bene, may againe want being. And with this, in respect of the Diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Totæ rerum natura umbra est, aut inanitas, the whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse then nothing, and meete vanitie.*

Of the tenne plagues wherewith the Ægyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the Riuer into blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Fore-fathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Revelation may bee fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water say, Lord, thou art iust, which art, and which wast, and holy, because thou hast iudged these things: for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou changed their blood to drinke.

The rest of the plagues by Froeges, Lice, Flies, or stinging Waspes, by the death of their Cattle; by leprous Scabbies, by Haile and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknesse; after which Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence: moued the hardned heart of the vbelieving King no longer, then the paine and perill lasted; till such time as his owne first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. Hethen, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood vpon no condition: whereas before, he first yielded unto the departure of the men, then of the men, women, and children, reseruing their bestiall; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their owne, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his owne people: of which (the feare being past) hee suddainly repented him, as his pursuit after them proued. For when euery one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses received) slaine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Passouer, (a Sacrament of the most cleane and vnspotted Saviour,) and with the blood thereof coloured the poste and linterne of the doores; the Angel of God in the night smote euerie first-borne of Ægypt, from the sonne of the King, to that of the Begger and Slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Ægyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites vsed after the Passouer, ascribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not only marke their Sheepe and Cattel, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserue them from lightning and other harmes.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

Now, when the people were removed, and on their way, (his heart being hardned by God) he be thought him as well of the Honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and in despite of himselfe. And hauing before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted with himselfe, what way the Israelites were like to take. Hee knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistims. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to wit, through the Desert of Etham; and there, because the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, hee thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape escape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Ægypt, and 600. of his owne, and Capthines ouer them, hee determined to set vpon them in the plaines of Gosen, which way soeuer they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not looked, the Brittaines vsed against the Romans, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Armie of Pharaoh, Iosephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot bee doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Armie, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things, eyther that the Hebrewes might ioyne themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leaue his seruice, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieued him withall, enforst him at this time to giue an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Iosephus partiall in this affaie, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Ægypt: which could not bee done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on sixtene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattel and Sheepe with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessling the dread of a powerfull Enemie at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that hee went out with a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his Enterprizes: so hee lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vsing the vnderstanding which God had giuen him, hee left nothing vnperformed, becoming a Wife man, and a valiant and skilfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, & commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passouer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rende-gum of all the Hebrewes at Ramases in the Territory of Gosen, a Citie standing indifferent to receiue from all parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue commandement, that euery Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dow, and Pasture, not staying to make it into bread, knowing then that Pharaoh was on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moses was vtterly vnprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites were vpparmed) he marched from Ramases East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which hee performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the yeere. Whether in former times they had bene accustomed to begin their yeere in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Ægyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is vnertain. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politicke yeere, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities therunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vs. Wherefore in referring things done, or hapning among them, vnto the beginning, middle, or ending of the yeere, that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politicke yeere is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euery Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeere, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in forty yeeres space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was giuen in trust; but that any rule of framing their Calendar, was made publike, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I do not finde. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew yeere: with the difference betwene them and other Nations, in ordering the account of time.

§. VI.

Of the Solarie and Lumarie yeeres: and how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

11. Ianuarie.
12. Februry.

N E Adar was an intercalarie Moneth, added, some yeeres, unto the other twelve, to make the Solarie and Lumarie yeere agree; which (besides the generall inconvenience that would otherwise haue risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine Precept. For God appointed speciall Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a fit day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones; and the like: which could not haue so bene kept, if eyther the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe bene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeere.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their Solemnities in the due time, and to attaine all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commoditie of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their yeeres unquall, by adding sometimes, & sometimes abating one or more dayes, as the error committed in foregoing yeeres required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made vp a compleat yeere. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most sauage of all people, when a yeere hath passed ouer them; yet the necessitie of ordinarie occurrences, that are to be numbered by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole yeeres insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men obserued the Monethly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeere into twelue parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and those againe into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the vnderstanding. Twelue reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by 11. daies or thereabout, than the yerely course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of sixteene yeeres, euery moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeere, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the yeere, making it to consist of twelue Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yerely reuolution by any set number of whole dayes; neyther did the Moone change alwaies at one houre; but the verie minutes and lesser fractions were to be obserued by him; that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

Heere lay much wisdome and deepe Art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the yeere to containe three hundred and sixtie daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Gracian yeere (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifest

Plin. l. 2. c. 6. by that which Plinie directlie affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of

Demetrius Phalerens, which were (saith he) 360. whilst as yet the yeere exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neyther did any certaine age of the Moone begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeeres, in their owne places: but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inserted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupie their owne roomes in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnities of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Hecatombion (which answereth in a manner to our June) they were carefull to take order, that this Moneth might euer beginne with the new Moone, which they effected by adding some two daies to the last Moneth of euery yeere; those Games being held once in foure yeeres. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euen; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the second of the Moneth Hadromion; (agreeing neerely with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lumarie yeere, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of Iune would euery yeere haue growne colder and colder, had they not fought to keepe all vp right, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere one whole Moneth, which they called the second Posideon or December, which was the deuice of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. daies, and so successiue through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeere as neere as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but these makes which they obserued, were found at length to be deceitfull Guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeeres intercalation, that it should not deceiue them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeeres intercalation, deuised a Cycle of 19. yeeres, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne out her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before past shee had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were annoyed the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had been vied; for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeeres, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one yeere could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeeres; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Astrologer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Caesar made, who by aduice of the best Mathematicians, then to bee found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the yeere vnto the forme which is now in vye with vs, containing 365. daies and six houres, which houres in foure yeeres make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeere, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian yeere by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent; it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the worke of Caesar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obserued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entered the Aquinaltiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeere 1582. ten daies sooner found in that time, Pope Gregorie strooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which meanes the moueable Feasts depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Councell they had bene. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundredth yeere, the Lease day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yerely course take vp full fixe houres about the 365. daies; but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. yeeres make about three whole dayes.

But

But the Cycle of 19. yeeres, which the Hebrewes vsed, was such as neither did need any nice curiositie of houres, minutes, and other lesser Fractions to helpe it; neither did in summing vp the dayes of the whole yeere, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwayes the Kalends or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone, and because that day was so situall, they were very carefull as well to obserue the short yeere of the Moone, passing through all the 12 Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gaue it to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second Moneth 29. dayes; and so successiue 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained somewhat euently two revolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. yeeres; to 6. of which 7. were commonly giuen 30. dayes to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common yeere (as appeareth by the severall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the yeere, where in the Sunne finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoeuer they were neglected in one yeere, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeeres were so disposed of by conuenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the same day of the yeere, Moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had bene at the beginning of it 19. yeeres before.

Genes. Ch. 1.

Diuers haue diuerly set downe the forme of the Hebrew yeere, with the manner of their Intercalations. Stigonius tells vs, that euery second yeere they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; euery fourth yeere a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeere of the Sun. But herein Stigonius was very much deceived. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes: and therefore to haue added so many dayes to the end of the yeere, had bene the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the yeeres following, which could not haue begun as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard saith, that euery third yeere, or second yeere, as p need requir'd, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeere, or vnto the other 12. This I beleue to haue bene true; but in which of the yeeres the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) methinks they doe not probably deliuer, who keepe all farre from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. yeeres. For (to omit such as erre grossly) some there are who say, that after three yeeres, when besides the dayes spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeere; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were in plussage vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixt yeere; at which time, besides the Intercalarie Moneth, remained fixe daies, namely, three surmounting that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeeres, besides the three formerly referred. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeere; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeere, make vp a Moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all euene.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor denie, yet surely it must needs haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeere euery Moneth were remoued from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeere and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnauoydable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yere. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixt yeeres, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. yeeres, doe sutficely make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yere following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the yeeres ensuing the lesse from the proper season of euery Moneth. This may suffice to bee spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and yeeres, by which they guided their accounts,

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea, and of the diuers wayes leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recouer the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse then to goe out of that way, of all other the secret. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betwene it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of about a Million, if not two Millions of soules, (for as it is written, Exod. 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those desert and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that saltresse he should haue ouer taken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult: by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. miles distant; and fate downe betwene two ledges of Mountaines adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, & Baalzephon towards the South: the time which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Had. And, as Phagius noteth, the word is compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus specule, siue custodie, Lord of the watch-towre. For the Egyptians beleueed, or at least made their slauess beleue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turnes. Aegyptij dijs sacundi; The Egyptians were fruitful in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who incamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towre asleepe, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all those Egyptians and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

Climax is rather to be called in respect of a passage up and downe, then that it is any proper name.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casiotia, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Iudas, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, betwene the Mountaines, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate sight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wash of the Sea: in so much as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves forsook those perils in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the booke of Wisedome, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despair in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

§. VIII

6. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it self.

Ut Moses who feared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnesse, who hath neuer abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; vsing this comfortable and resolute speech: Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye haue seene this day, ye shall neuer see them againe. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, recieued encouragement, and commanded to goe on in these wordes: wherefore cryest thou vnto mee? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuיד it, and let the children of Israel goe on dry ground through the middell of the Sea, Moses obeying the voice of God, in the darke of the night finding the sands vnconquered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne winde, and by Moses rod to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written : The Angell of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behinde them, as the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behinde them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministry of his Angell, to interpose his defence betwene the Hebrewes and their enemies, to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmefull speede. But in the morning watch Moses loosed the other bank of Arabia side : and Pharaoh (as the dawne of day began to illighten the obscure air) finding a beginning of the Seas returne, halted himselfe towards his own Coast : But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moved by the power of God, ran backe towards the land with vnrscissible furie and swiftnesse, and overwhelmed the whole Armie of Pharaoh, as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheels, that is, when the waters began to couer the sands, and Egyptians being stricken with feare of death ran one aduirt another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheels stucke fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out : the Sea comming against them with supernaturall violence.

Tyrannus vpon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God diuined the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearful to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Iuda first made the adventure, and that therefore was that Tribe ever after honored above the rest, according to the prophetic of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe vnto thee. But Hierome vpon the 11. of Moses condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Iuda had the first place in all their marches in the Defart, and as we now call it, led the Vanguard, (where vpon it may be infered, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himselfe was the Conduer of Israel at that time, it is generally receiued. For as it is written in the 77. Psalme: Thou didst leade thy people like sheepe by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrewes have also another fancie, that the Red Sea was diuided into twelue parts, and that euery Tribe past ouer in a path apart, becauſe it is written in the 135. Psalm according to the vulgar: Diſtiterunt mare rubrum in diſiunctiones; He diuided the Red Sea in diſiunctiones. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a greene Field or Pasture. But Origē, Epiphanius, Abulenſis, and Genezard, fauouring this conceit, had forgotten to conſider, that there were not twelue Pillars, nor twelue Armies of the Aegyptians. It is written in 77. Psalm, v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy wayes; and in the last of the booke of Wise dome, ver. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, though which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, therewife called Chenebrich, perished in the 16. yeere of his reign; is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea, though the name differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third booke noteth, and our felus know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entrench at a narrow strait betweene Arabia the Happy and Aethiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolome calleth Possidium, to the other Land of Aethiopia, hath not above fixe leagues in breadth, and the same also filled euery where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth vp between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petraea, on one side, and Aethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the vttermoſt end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses paſt, is called Horopolis of the Citie Hero; sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Plinie calls it Cambisu, by which name it was knowne, ſaith he, before it was called Hero many yeeres. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it: Elaniticum: King Inba Elaniticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolomie, Elana: Plinie, Lana: Iosephus, Ilana, and Marius Niger, Aila: 1st. Ant. Sc. c. 29. there is also Ilalah in Aſſyria, to which Salmanaſſar carried the Iſraelites captive, Kings 2. c. 8. v. 11. which Ilalah in Aſſyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the first of Chron. the Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuerſly named, the Moors and Arabians (Vassals to the Turke) know it by no other appellation, then the Gulfe of Mecca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythraeus: and becauſe Erythras in the Greeke ſignifieth Red: hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythraeus, the ſonne of Percus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quin. Curtius coniectureth: which Arian, de geſt. Ar. Mag. l. 8. Strabo l. 8. Strabo confirme. But it ſeemeth to me by the view of a diſcouery of that Sea in the yeere 1544. performed by Steuen Gama, Viceroy of the Eaſt India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was ſo called from a reflection of redneſſe, both from the banks, cliffs, and ſands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Caſtro, a principall Commander vnder Gama (which diſcoure I gaue Maſter Richard Haſſitt to publiſh) that there is an Iland called Dalaqua, sometime Leques, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth; the earth, ſands, and cliffs, of which Iland, being of a reddiſh colour, ſerue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it ſeeme altogether of the ſame colour. Secondly, the ſame Caſtro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying in it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs and bankes are of red earth, or ſtone, which by reflection of the Sun-beames, giue a kinde of reddiſh luſter to the waters. Thirdly, thoſe Portugals report, and we know it by many teſtimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the ſhore, great abundance of red ſtones, on which the greateſt ſtore of Corall growes, which is carried into moſt parts of Europe, and elſewhere. There are alſo on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, ſaith Strabo, and thoſe growing vnder water, may alſo be a cauſe of ſuch a colour. Of theſe appearances of redneſſe by the ſhadowes of theſe ſtones, ſands, earth, and cliffs, I ſuppoſe that it firſt tooke the name of the Red Sea, becauſe in ſo many places it ſeemeth to be ſuch: which Iohannes Barros in his ſecond Decade, eight Booke and firſt Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana or Ezion Gaber adioyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which waſheth the banks of Adiam or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, ſome three Leagues or nine Engliſh miles ouer, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the firſt 26. haue nine miles breadth, as aforeſaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thruſt themſelues into the Sea, & ſtreighten it ſo faſt, as for fixe miles together it is not about three miles ouer, from thence vpward the land on Egypt ſide, falleth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Coue for ſomen miles together, after which the land growes vpon the Sea againe, and ſo bindes it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses paſt it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer-againſt Elana or Toro, but without iudgement: for from Ramaſes to Pihacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not about 30. miles interiacent, or 35. miles at moſt, which Moses paſt ouer in three dayes: and betweene the land of Egypt oppoſite to Elana or Toro, the diſtance is about 80. miles. For Ramaſes, to which Citie Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gofen) when hee left Pharao at Zoan, and tooke his laſt leave, ſtandeth in 30. degrees fixe minutes of Septentrional Latitude; and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountaine Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twentie and a halfe, which made a difference of fixe and thirtie Engliſh miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

The Aegyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharao conducted more by surer then discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recouer the coast of Aegypt, he was ouer-taken by the flood and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to ment that beleue not therein, peraduenture nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there bene no other working power from above, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel than ordinary and casual, then could not Pharao and all his Armie haue perished in that pursuit.

For when, sooner there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and run downeward towards the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as faire as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entering the Sea at Midol vnder Baalzephon (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunity of the tyde; must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, ten or twelue miles farther into the Sea then Sues, and betwene it and where Moses past: who entered the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleue or Strait, had bene by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discovered, when Pharao found the flood increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Aegypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: & so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses past on betwene two Seas, and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armes destruction, proue the cause to haue bene a power above nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinare: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but, in effect North and South. And it must haue bene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South, and maine body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being vnkowne to Pharao: while he was checkt by that Sea which vsed in all times before to ebbe away, the flood prest him and ouerwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Capitaine, as he ouer-threw the Ethiopians in battels, being imployed by Pharao, and wanne diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this grossefesse, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which hee would there winne vpon Pharao) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water. For hee knew not the contrarie, but that Pharao might haue found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharao approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety: and when Moses prayed vnto God for helpe, hee was answered by God: wherefore cryest thou vnto me? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: which proues that there was not at the time of *Pharao*s approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands

discouered themselves betwene the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters to defended them on both sides, as the Aegyptians could onely follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood vpright as wals doe, as some of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharao and the Aegyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone haue quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharao and the Aegyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Countrey, on his owne Coast, & in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens; and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of yeeres experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowledge or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely; which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their owne prosperitie, they least discern it comming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Armie of the Aegyptians had bene ouer-taken by the ordinary returne of the flood, before they could recouer their owne Coast; their bodies drowned would haue bene carried with the flood which runneth vnto Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not haue bene cast all there on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-banke ouer against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would haue carried them: Which flood doth not any where crosse the Channell, and runneth awart it, as it must haue done from Aegypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the bodies there; but it keepes the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carcasses should haue bene carried, if the worke had not bene supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Aegyptians which staid in the Countrey, and did not follow Pharao in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honor those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were buid at the time of *Pharao*s destruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a god of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be giuen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tels vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. yeeres after Christ, the prints of *Pharao*s Chariot wheelles were to be seene at a low water on the Aegyptian lands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared againe. But herof I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe.

Of the iourning of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites meet with the Israelites.

BV to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeere of the World 2434. Saphrus then gouerning Assyria, Orthopolis Syconia, or Peloponnesus, Crisus the Argines; Orus Aegypt, Adi-7, Denudation Thessalie: He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. yeeres, Ismael 14, 2474. in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeeres after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Aegypt, and wrought

14. his miracles in the fields of Zaan, in the yeere 2514, the last moneth of that yeere. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the dayes they at Sunne setting, in the yeere of the World 2514. was the celebration of the Passeover: and in the dead of the night of the same day were all the first-borne slaine through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrewes inhabited not. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrewes called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeere of the World 2514. Moses with the children of Israel removed from the generall assembly at Ramses, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence they made their third Station at Etham: and iourning from Etham, they incamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, vnder the Mountaine Bazephon; and in the same night after mid-night, they past the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his Armie perishing in their returne, about the first dawne of the day. Moses having recovered the banks of Arabia, gaue thanks vnto God, for the deliuerie of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entered the Deserts of Arabia Petrea, called Sur. But finding no water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desert of Etham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22, is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel prest with extreme thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaohs approach with Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neere a Lake of bitter water, and calling the same thereto, made the same sweet: a plaine ope and figure of our Saviour; who vpon the tree of the Crosse changed the bitterness of this euertlasting death into the sweetnesse of eternal life. Plinie remembers the bitter Fountaines in his sixth Booke and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Aegypt, Seiostris first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolomie the second, began to cut an artificiall Riuer, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to trade and navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles; where finding twelue Fountaines of sweet water, and three-score and ten Palm trees, he rested diuers dayes.

Whether this Elim were the name of a Towne or Citie in Moses time, I cannot asseuer. And yet the scarcitie of waters in that Region was such, as Elim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly be left vnpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his Historie of the Holy Warre, found at Elim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And at such time as Baldwine the first past that way into Aegypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim, *Ciuitatem antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum peruenisset, loci illius incolae, Regis aduentum praenitio, manualem ingredientes in mare vicinum fecerunt, Entring Helim a very ancient Citie, well knowne sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants forewarned of the Kings approach,ooke Boates, and shifted themselves into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim he returned againe towards the South, and came downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the eleuenth Mansion. For it seemeth that hee had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountering with the least miserie, were more apt to returne to their quiet slauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vndertake or sustaine so dangerous an enemy: hee therefore made stay at this Mansion, vntill the fifteenth of this second Moneth called Zim, or Iar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desert of Zin, where the children of Israel mutined against Moses the third time, hauing want of food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the red Sea, but in the collection of euery feuerall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set downe.*

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of Quails, as all the Countrie about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being so the sixteenth of their Moneth, which serued them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Aegypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattell, and Sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feede themselves with many of those: but reserued them both for the milke to releeue the children withall: and for breede to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie miles: the one to to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim fixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Aegypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casuall and sometime necessary want, and to vndergoe the hazards and trauiels which euery manly mind seeketh after, for the loue of God, and their owne freedoms. But Moses with the same rod which he diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

Exod. 17.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethros coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

AND while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and guessed that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrie (which being barren of it selfe, would be vterly waisted by so great a multitude of People and Cattell) thought it most for their advantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of the children of Israel, were wanting. On the other side Moses perceiving their resolutions, gaue charge to Iosua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to encounter Amalech. Betweene whom and Israel, the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulies for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God bene of farre greater force, and more preualent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly indamaged the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnacquainted with scarcity of food, and those mindes whom a sterile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despaird in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought againe to hazard themselves.

After this victory, Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receive, till hee had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v. 1. When Iethro the Priest of Madian, Moses Father in law heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai, where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel, being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and conuoueries among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Iudges v. 11 & 17. it is manifest; where it is written; Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the sonne of Iethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites: Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocke. And that Saul spared this Nation, he gieth vp for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the illies of Madian, one of the fixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Aegypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had hee found them Idolaters) haue made Iethros Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these; who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the

Gen. 25.

the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis verse nineteenth, these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh or Kadesb. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into severle Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neere the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to have bene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Deserts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petraea, were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yett the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000. Israelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his viues kindred inhabited, seeing himselfe coming with 600000. able men, was encountered by Amalech in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Deserts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. yeeres.

That Iethro, or Jathor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Valgar and Sepuagims, which call him Raguel, and our English Reuel, Exodus 2. 18. calls him Iethro, or Jathor, Exod. 1. & v. 1. & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10 & 12. and in Numer. c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro & Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

The first of the months of this yeere 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalme v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 1. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10. & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. which hearde (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius, who in the yeere 1588. past out of Aegypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and trauiled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Maronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he incamped thereabout almost a yeere, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is writt, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angell of God was giuen to Moses, where hee staied staied a whole yeere, wanting some ten or twelue dayes: for he removed not till the 20. day of the second month of the second yeere; and hee arriued about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way disioyned, hee may turne ouer a few leaves, and omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfullst meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to gouern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North Starre is the most fixed direction of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in general, to the haue of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and various men; yea, the very spirit, & the very sinewes of currey Elicite in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what hee hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the sonnes of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse virtue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians, received their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romans sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

The word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and in an indifferent sense vsed. For if we consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And for the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any priuate ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be obserued by force, for their decrees doe also vniuerse that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay Woe vnto them that they decree wicked decrees, and write grievous things. Like wise, the word is vsed for the tumultuarie resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though euill and vnjust: Mala lex est, quæ tumultuarie posita est. It is an ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, cyther good or euill, are called by the name of Lawes.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their patterne and plat-forme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem sensus, is to be vnderstood. For euery law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as elsewhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law: But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the Law of my minde, and leading me captiue vnto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and inclination of all creatures are sometime called a lawes, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternall, as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

Also priuate contracts among Merchants and other Trade-men, doe often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, prescribing a necessarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill communitie. The rest, to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquae, are by Thomas called violencia maior quam leges; rather compulsion then lawes: And whatsoever is not iust, S. Augustine doth not allow for lawes, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quae nec cura descendenda, nec putanda sunt; The vniuersall constitutions of men which are neither to be termed nor thought lawes. For saith Aristotle, Legalia iusta sunt factiua, & conseruatiua felicitatis; Just lawes are the workers and preservers of happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life euertlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, saith Plato, is God and his worship: Finitis legis Deus & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando of reading or binding: Leges quælibet &c. ad populum latae, saith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might reade them, & behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confringerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they haue broken the yoke; they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let vs breake their bands in suer, and cast away their cords from vs.

The Couenient it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntarie submission of themselves vnto it: for which word the Separing, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vsē the word διαθήκη, a Testament or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectuall for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nómos of distributing, because it distributeth to every man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: Iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The reigne of the law, is the reigne of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shunne: or Lex est omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen or Princesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of ineuitable fate. Law is the very wisdome of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent; and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Index sui & curui, the demonstration of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the law, the iudge and measure of right and wrong.

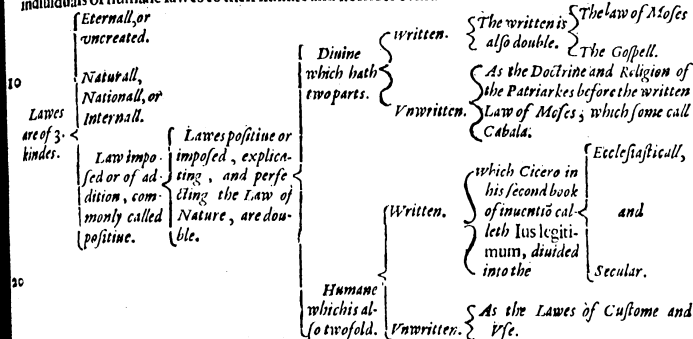

M. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius Civile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Ius and Fas: wherof Ius, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goe ouer another mans field, is permitted, by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vsēd both these words: as Fas & iura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the olde substantiue Noun iussus, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke δίκη, which is the name of Iustice, or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis; because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that Ius-iurandum came of Iouis-iurandum, (for so we finde it written in Nomus out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it iuramentum lebonæ) so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Pleigerents the Magistrates, hee is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this Ius the iust are denominated, iustus à iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the law eternall.

BEcause lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leauing the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex aeterna est aeternus diuina sapientie conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præcognitarius; The eternall law is the eternall concept of Gods wisdome as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himselfe. Or Lex aeterna est summa atque aeterna ratio diuina sapientia: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis iuxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternall reason of diuine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessitie according to their seuerall nature, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnderstanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called prouidence: but as it imposeth a necessity according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law.

Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & à delicto auocans: quæ non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente diuina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est recta summi Iouis; That perfect reason and nature of things encouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (saith he) then beginne to bee a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true Law and a fit Princesse to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to diuers objects, so the reason of man findes it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessarie, as the motions of the heauens; stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuersall: and therto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternall directing more largely: as well euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man, to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a stream from this fountaine.

The law humane or temporall is also thence drawn; in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subiected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Directour: as, Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres: heauens of heauens: for he hath established them for ever & ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth yee Dragons and all Depths: Fire and hyle, snow and vapours, stormie windes, which execute his Word: mountaines, and hills: fruitful trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicitie proposed vnto them (beatitudine being both the attractive, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselves, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, knowne cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatsoeuer is apposed. This kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate, a difference vied in comes only; it being no other then Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appeare in themselves thence deriued: there vnder subiected: thence from by his eternall law and providence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or apperition, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex aeterna est, qua iustum est vs omnia sunt ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-Will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Padagogie of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should bee expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Sauour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatus est. But I rather thinke these words of our Sauour to haue no other signification, then that the propheticie of their giuing him Vinegar to drinke was fulfilled. For so Saint Iohn expounds it, when he saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, vt consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Jewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe, but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisdome of Salomon, And being one shee can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

¶ The law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: onely as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aeternae in rationali creatura. Primum defines the naturall law to be the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Lex naturalis est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and hee afterward addeth, Iustitiam hominibus humani generis propriam, sed omnium animalium qua terra marique nascuntur, animi quoque commune est; The law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth.

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall providence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in Men, enlightning our formall reason; so is it more then sense in Beasts; and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their liues: seeing that Bulles and Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogges; and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other, yea, though by them neuer seene before; and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twiggies which hang ouer Riuers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere: to saue their egges and young ones from the Monkees, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twigge will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palm-tree, will not beare any fruite except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that Law, which the infinite and vnsearchable wisdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassall to passions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and custome hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which Saint Augustine calleth the Law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the Lawes of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to vie one anothers Wife, and to the Woman to chiole them others besides their Husbands, to beget their with childe: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloued wiues: as also they haue many other customes remembered by G. Valentinus, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Lawes some men auaue to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selues by another mans destruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall Lawes, either out of Saint Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of diuine light, the other, the dictate or sentence of practique reason) the same can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, than to the exercise of iustice and vprightnesse: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which wee would be content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the Law of nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to David sheweth vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which leade vs thereby to our last end; which is eternall life: though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the Law increased and eternall. For without any Law written, the right reason and vnderstanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which haue not the Law, doe by nature those things contained in the Law: they haue not the Law, are a Law vnto themselves. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the same right vnto all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation; In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which shew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for a witness of those effects: and she reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And

§. VII. Of the written Law of GOD.

After the eternall, and naturall, the law positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds: Diuine and Humane. Again, the diuine positive law is double; the Olde and New: The Olde was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had flood 2312. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere, when as Afcades or Afcades gouerned the Affrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argines, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeeres. And this it seemes, was the first written law which the world receyued. For the very word Nomes, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Gracians: no nor in Homer time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was cast down 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his exprell wil in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight detences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason knowne to vs why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of Families might easily without any written Law, instruct their owne Children: and yet as they increased, so double they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and euill; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authority than other to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, impute the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of Dauid, The law of the Lord is vnspotted, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisdom to children. For the humane Law, saith Saint Augustine, mereth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by Dauid it is called vnspotted.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the Lawes of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that wee be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by Dauid: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actioes hominum nulle essent, nisi prius in mente dicrentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conuerted in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of trueth, which by reason of diuersities of opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, wee cannot be assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also sayde Dauid, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giuing wisdom to children.

§. VIII. Of the vnwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarkes by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, betwene the creation and the written Law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarkes of the first Age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was obserued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered ouer by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Jewes afterward called called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, relearned in the bosoms of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the diuine law reuealed to the Patriarkes, and from them deliuered to the posterity, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that hee should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam or Adan, Earth, or red clay, he gaue other names significant, not onely to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruites, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence after being commanded to cohabit with their Wives, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vnknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and iustice interposing between the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a seruant of seruants shall he be vnto his brethren. Again, we find that the vnaturall sin of the Solomonites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heaven. The sinne of Adulterie and Rauishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the iudgement which Isa gaue against Tamar. That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharao & Amelch, against whom this sentence was pronounced. Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans wife. To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise vp seede to his brother that left a widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be faide, not onely to haue bene written in the hearts of men, before it was engrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene giuen in precept to the Patriarkes. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: to euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten law: the Angels intuitiuelly; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know what seuer the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law. When it is opposed, or differed from the Prophets and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must bee fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms.

Rom. 7. 23.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

Eph. 6. 4.
Gal. 3. 18.

When it is opposed to Grace, it significth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summius: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace.

John 1. 17.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it significth but shadows and figures; as, The Law was given by Moles, but grace & truth came by Iesus Christ.

Gal. 3. 22.
1 Tim. 4. 6.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christ's comming, it significth the whole polity of the Jewes Common-weale; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. Or the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied unto Iohn. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

Eph. 6. 2.
1 Tim. 5. 23.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the Law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of conscience, &c.

1 Peter 2. 10.

But the ritten Law of Moles, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse, and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the law, and threatening death to those which break the law in the least. For, according to S. Iames, whoever shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition vied by the Schoolmen, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given. Lex diuina est diuina decretum, hominibus praescribens modum necessarium et apte peruenit ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quae est diuinae humanae uitae finis; The diuine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary meane, whereby they may get to attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

Eph. 6. 12.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part containeth that which is good to be done, and this or that euill to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whom it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Again, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holinesse; (for eternall worship, and the order of following our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common wealth of the Jewes, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equity. And therefore was it saide of Saint Paul, The commandment is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the government of the Common wealth of the Jewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passeouer, and such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyinges, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mixt Garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other vnnatural and vnproper commixtions, as Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seede in one field. It also exhorteth to naturall compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty euen to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For some reſerue these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beate downe the first buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the comming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: saving in the ability of iustifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worship God: and to vse charitie one towards another: which for euer shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, & for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liueth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it stil liueth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are stil expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christ's comming, and in a farre lesse degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Iudiciall liueth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuersall equity thereof.

But the Morall liueth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vse and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadows) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Jewes Common-weale and policie.

§. X. A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

As for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Maiesty of the Law-giuer.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniency of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacie and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old & new Testament.
7. The end and vse of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proued by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforeſaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maiesty of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, so he only gaue the Law, who could only giue the end and reward promised, to wit, the saluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels: as it is saide, And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiuing this Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disſeuered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and ſeuered they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham and his ſeede: not vnto his ſeede, as to Eſau and Jacob, but to his ſeede, as to Jacob or Iſrael singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his ſeede were the promises made: hec ſayth Gal. 3. 6. not to the ſeede, as ſpeaking of many, but to thy ſeede, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conueniency of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Auguſtine: that it was about the middle time, betwene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandments receiued by Moses in the worlds yeere 2514. continued to the Baptiſme of Iohn: from which time, began the Law of Grace, which ſhall continue to the worlds end. Other reaſons for the conueniency are formerly giuen.

5. The fit consideration is of the efficacie of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or signe of our Iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were finnes forgiven, who taketh away the finnes of the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weak; beggerly as containing no grace, weak as not able to forgive and iustifie. The blood of Goats and Bulles, and the ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward foule. For if the law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

§. XI. Of the first point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

The Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way propofed for attaining to faluation: as the Olde by workes, the New by grace: but in the thing it selfe, or object and remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse and faluation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the New of more excellencie, in that it doth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perihable: but the New was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apofstles, a Testament and Gospell for ever duering.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and cheefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and cheefe part thereof, is the gl'ifying of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apofstles, and the Acts or story of the Apofstles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word euangelion, signifying a ioyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homere vied it) the reward given to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tydings in generall, as in Esay the 52. verse 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most ioyfull message of faluation, as in Luce 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and so we understand the foure Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. & 2 Cor. 5. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are divided in volumes) is by Danians comprised in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousnesse and iustification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was there one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the olde propofing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: even the faluation of our foules: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the Law, an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrewes: All these dyed in faith, and received not the promises, but saw them farre off, and beleued them; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also Saint Augustine: Omnino pauci veterem legem intellegunt, non attendentes

Gen. 12. 13.
Heb. 11. 13.
1 Cor. 13. 12.

tendentes per promissa terrena aterna promissi: Few (saith he) do understand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. Hierome: Noluit Deus pascere Iudaeos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Iudei somniant; God would not feed the Iudaeos as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselves dreame. And this may be gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise, but in respect of the future to wit, the safety of their foules. For as God created both body and foule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncaured for, which lieth euer.

The agreement betweene the Old and New Testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laide both by the Apofstles and Prophets; in whom all the promises of God in the Olde and New, are assured: the Fathers having eaten the same spirituall foode, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the Law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospell, the proper effects whereof are mercy and faluation: to which the Law serueth as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and faluation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwise if we feared the Law from subordination to the Gospell, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousnesse by workes, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Gospell healeth: the Law retrieth, the Gospell allureth; Moses accuſeth, Christ defendeth; Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex quae non sanat (saith Saint Augustine) sed quae agrotantes probat; The Law was given, not to helpe, but to discover sickness: and Saint Chrysostome, Data est lex, ut se homo inueniret, non ut moribus sanaretur; sed ut medicus quaereretur; The Law was given that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seeke out the physician. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a servant, and Christ a Son; so the great benefit was referred to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

§. XII. Of the rest of the points propofed.

The feuenth consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteousnesse in our owne workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and ymoſt end: the next and proper end of the law, is to preferre righteousnesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The second end of the Law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, do not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteousnesse, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and cheefe end of the law, is as hath beene said, to send vs to Christ, and his grace, being in our felues condemned and lost. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearfull tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and preserve, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vse of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The vse of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equity, and right, whereto we must conforme our felues.

The sense and vnderstanding of the Law is double, littrell and spirituall: by the littrell we are taught the worship and seruice of God: by the spirituall, the figures and myſticall fore-ſpeakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being vntill the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the

Crosse, come,

Crosse, then the Leuitish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof, the vail of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailles and shadowes were now to be renoued, not that the morall law of the Commandements was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise then that it had not power to condemn according to the Leuitish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe feuerely commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witnessd. And heerein Dauid so much reioycd, as he preferred the obseruation of the Law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delatus sum, sicut in omnibus diuitijs; I haue been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And againe, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the loue of God (saith S. Iohn) that we keepe his Commandement. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandement (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in between that thou shouldst say, Who shall goe up for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cause vs to heare it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldst say, Who shall goe over the Sea for vs, and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very neere vnto thee, euen in thy mouth, & in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I haue set before thee this day, life and death good and euill, in that I command thee this day, to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his waies, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou mayst liue, &c. Neither is it faide in vaine in Saint Mathew. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serua mandata. If thou wilt enter into life keepe the Commandements: and in S. Iohns Scio quia mandatum eius eterna est, I know that his Commandement is life euerslasting. And if this bee the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandements: certainly he is but a liar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mansability, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if wee rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandements, we shall finde in our selues, how wee borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loose them from the chains of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that wee are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of libertie) proposeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God, that we keepe his Commandements, & his Commandements are not grieuous. 1. Iohn 3. 12. and if wee examine euery precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences; it is not hard for any man indeed, by what easie perswasions, we steale away from our owne power, as vnwilling to vie against our pleading desires.

§. XIII. Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

For by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby we are inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity, that by this almighty Vnity, all things haue bin caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for euery of them, Which giueth to beasts their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla bonis inijs orta sunt. All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the deuil crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant foules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if hee be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthless worthlesse then the most worthless of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more vilde prize and baser, then the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Wisdome of Salomon) but call to the weak for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assist once in our iournies of him that cannot go, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which he prayeth, bee more senselesse: Dauid maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

The breach of the third Commandement, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disclaime of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an aduantage. For as our corruptest nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euerslasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the deuil brought vp among men, without all subtilty of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most salvage Nations of the world do not vie it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the laborer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The fifth of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God giues vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weak and helpless infancie, and bestowed on vs the largest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering of their violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murder, that is, thou shalt not do the actes following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. Affectio cuius tua (saith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vie of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from Adultery. Now, if the presumption of Virginitie haue bene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to the graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beauty and forme hath constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kinde of violent robbery had bene vied in Moses time, which many Russians practise now a dayes in England, and to the dishonor of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speak not of the poore and miserable foules, whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth, but of those detested Theeues, who to maintaine themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man; or breake by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkennesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impouerishing whole Families, and taking the bread and foode from the mouthes of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued, it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolute, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hell-hounds. And if euery man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandement of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wiuces for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gaine. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to obserue; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections: and yet if wee iudge heereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughtes. For: I though it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restraime and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, & seeke for grace. How the word Coueting reacheth to all those it is to be considered. For Concupiscencia, according to some, Est essentia habendi appetitus, An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of hauiug: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selues by any unnatural frailty, or vnadvised error; But as I suppose, the word Concupiscencia is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbridled euill intent, or for some vrging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as we resist such motions, they hurt vs not: as they say, Quando resistimus nihil nocent: nocent autem cum e dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not; and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to haue sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath bene forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandement, not onely the outward acte, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into acte, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandement and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so euent the Morall Philosopher cantellvs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandement forbidden, together with the outward acte: and therefore, if we will haue any thing proper to this Commandement, wee must needs say, that the euill desires of the Continent man (that is, euent those which wee resist and bridle) are heere forbidden. For though he that bridlcth his euill desires, be much better than hee that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euent according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to haue the at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinity deliuereth touching this matter. For as he saith, that in the Continent man the hauiug of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the hauiug of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of diuinity to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the euill desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridlcth them, must needs be sinne: seeing so such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull endeouours to keepe his commandements, we witnesse our loue toward himselfe: we may not safely giue liberty to our vanities, by casting backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandements impossible for vs to keepe. For, as hee is accused (saith Saint Hierome) that auowes that the Law is in all things possible to be obserued: so he hath made this addition: Maledictum qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcipisse; Accused is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the Law: so is our weaknesse also in the Scriptures laide before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without easiness, or without betraying of our selues, doe our faithfull endeouours to obserue them: which if we doe vnfaithfully, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, David witnesseth: Enter not into iudgement with thy seruants, for in thy sight no flesh that liueth shall be iustificed. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sineth not: And againe, Who can say, I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne greuous without deliberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether hee giue way willingly, or restraime himselfe in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King giues to his subiect a commandement vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subiect neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Souueraigne with shuffling excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

6. XIII.

If there were not any Religion nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be obserued.

AND if wee consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall Law, or ten Commandements, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull providence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them; were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if wee did not for our owne sakes strue to obserue these Lawes, all society of men, and all endeouours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and euery State and common-wealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that euery man might enioy the fruites of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, we might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts, of free-men, and not of slaues; of ciuill men, and not of sauaiges. And heereof making our humane reason onely Iudge, let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, euent among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit man-kinde to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, mettall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibility to receiue thence from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth there-with this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requieth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorn and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and seuerely punished, the race of mankinde would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giueth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe; This is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeour by vertue and vnderaking to raise Families: murders and poysonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthy and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all man-kinde would shortly after perishe, or or liceas the saluages, by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enioy the fruites thereof. And such is the mischief of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourefold, policie of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle begger and loyterer, against the carefull and painfull laborer: all triall of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The courting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we couer what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we do but couet; and if we do attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wiuers or goods of our neighbours, we can look for no other, but that our felues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there bee nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing? Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull & provident God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnprofitable, and of no vse. For wee should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappy condition.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written and vnnwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, Written, and Vnnwritten. The vnnwritten consists of vsage, approued by time; which Isidore calls Mores; and he defines Mores: to be Consuetudines vetustate probatae, to be customs approved by antiquity, or vnnwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from vse, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the law is defective, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars; the first are written customes, receiued and exercised by Nations, as the customs of Burundie and Normandie: the ancient generall custome of England, & the customs of Cassili, and other Prouinces.

The second are these petty customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others vnnwritten.

The particular or petty customes are seldom written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The customes of the Duchie of Cornwall comprehending also the Stannerie of Demon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Demon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoeuer vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought every custome to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Vlpian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis conualescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that every custome which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deeds, & therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they haue bene since continued, because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued. For non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nouam legem, & nouam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus Princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome against law: save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of praeique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduicement of wisemen, & the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit, All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall, and eternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercising necessary obseruances to the subiect. That euery Law cille publique authority: prescribing necessary obseruances to the subiect. That euery Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying; Nihil lex esse non videtur, quia iusta non fuerit; It seems to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no Law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines deriuauerint.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to bee made by an authorized Magistracie, it cannot bee doubted, be the government of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniqua constitutiones, Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so euery particular of the humane Law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Iulia de Adulterij, alia Cornelia de Sicarijs; The Law of Julian against Adultery is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another.

Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the Law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for euery Law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Vlpian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that diclate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted betwene enemies, &c. which Nationall Law, according to diuers acceptations, and diuers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

The Ciuile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers estates it is also diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof Vlpian, Ius ciuile neque in totum a naturalis & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei seruit; itaque cum aliquid addimus vel de iustitia liberalitatem iuri communi, Ius proprium, id est, Ciuile efficitur; The Ciuill Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

The Law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as wel out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Romane customs and Lawes Regall. The Regal Lawes were deuised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiae, or Papirianae, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquinius then reigning. For though so many of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished, Dion. Hist.

C. Sigon. L. 1. oue
et. P. 1. oue.

shed, with the name; yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the Lawes of the twelve Tables. To these Lawes of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus consulta: those of the common people, called Plébiscita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall Lawes; and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Collections of Justinian afterward were.

The difference anciently betweene Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that Lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soveraigne authority (be the soveraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall general and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Inssum Magistratus, vñ less by authority) is made by a Law hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Quiprius enim i. l. lo tribunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most unto an Edict, say that it is a Law for one year: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutiones or Edicta, these Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, & Edictum; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaime.

Lastly, the Humane Law is diuided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Caniſticall. The Secular Law commandeth temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquillity of the Common-weale: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Government of the Ecclesiasticall Common weale, or Church, Illud natura legem, hoc diuinum spectat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may the Ciuile be taken two ways; first, as distinguished from the Law of Nations, as in the first diuision: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diuers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this diuision of the Schoolmen is of little use. For although the Ciuile be the same with the Secular, as the Ciuile is a Law, yet the Secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the Ciuile, and all other Lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular Lawes, in vse among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-weales, there are three kinds; the Ciuile which hath euery where a voice; and is in all Christian Estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Provinciall. In Spain besides the Law Ciuile, they haue the customes of Castill, and other Provinces. In France besides the Ciuile, the customes of Burgundy, Biſcay, Berry, Niſnormis, and Lodunus, &c. Tous lieux ſins & hors en Lodunus, ſeront gouernez ſelon les customes du dit pays. All places lying within the precincts of Lodunus, shall be gouerned according to the customes of that place. There are also in France the customes of Normandy, and these of two kinds; Generall, and Locall; and all praged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of the ancient customes, before and since their reformation haue these words; Nos autem, regnum pradiatum, & ſus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, & approbamus, & autoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register aforesaid, laudable vse, and ancient customes we praise, approve, and by our Kingly authority confirme. The common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certaine Maxims by those customes of the Realme approoued. Vpon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

The ancient customes of England haue bene approoued by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disfiled, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England, that the eldest sonne should inherite without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise; and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all Landes (that haue not bene resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enioy the Inheritance during his owne life: and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of Land haue foure sonnes, and the eldest of those four haue also a sonne, the three Brothers of the eldest Sonne, shall after the death of their Brother, enioy their Fathers Landes before the Grand-child: the custome being grounded grounded vpon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, hauing alwayes liued in a subdiuided Ciuill Warre, not onely the greatest against the greatest, but euery Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforst to leaue successors of age and ability, to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Provinces of France, there are certaine peculiar and petty Customes, besides the great and generall custome of the Land, so are there in England, and in euery part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our Lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approved by the three estates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are Actes of choise, and selfe-desire. Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent quam quod iudicio populi recepte sunt; The Lawes vñ of de Leg. do therefore binde the subiect, because they are received by the iudgement of the subiect. Tum de leg. 1. §. 32. nam humanae leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo institutae, sed etiam firmatae approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane Lawes haue their strength, when they shall not onely be desired, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fasteneth these properties to euery Christian Law, that the same bee honest, that it bee possible, that it bee according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Country; also for the time and place conuenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of priuate profit, that it be written for the generall good. He also giues foure effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and instigation: the former binde vs by feare, to auoide vice; the latter incourage vs with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum; It behoueth the Law to bee a mender of vices, and a commander of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obseruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all Lawes: and it is two-fold; the one constraineth vs by feare of our consciences, the other by feare of externall punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactiue and Directiue.

The second of these two effects remembred by Modestinus, is Instigation, or incorage- ment to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being such as they ought to be, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, iurge vs to well-doing; laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmatiue commanding good, and power negatiue forbidding euil, are those into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which Dauid comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina a malo, & fac bonum; Decline from euil, and do good.

§. XVI. That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what sort.

NOW whether the power of the humane Law bee without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that haue written of this subiect, as well Diuines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes bee compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid; the one Directiue, the other Coactiue: to the power Directiue they ought to be subiect, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to giue a preiudiciall iudgement against himselfe; and if equals haue not any power ouer each other, much lesse haue inferiours ouer their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much about the lawes, as the soule and body vnited, is about a dead and senselesse carcase. For the King is truly called, Lex viuum, & lex animata: An animate and liuing Law. But this is true, that by giuing authority to lawes, Princes both adde greatnes to themselves, & conferre it; and therefore was it said of Bracton out of Justinian; Merito debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: namely, lex facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the King; for it is the law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Bracton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes diuine; and by humane lawes, onely, declared to bee Kings. As for the places remembred by the Diuines and Lawyers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, then the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God onely.

Idem. 60.

Tibi soli peccauit, fath Dauid; Against thee onely haue I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be faide to be subiect to the Law; Principes non subijcitur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernatiuae: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humana non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humana non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa resideat. Ergo neq. lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transfundendi aliud; Seeing humane Law (say they) is but a kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that governeth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Governour himselfe, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his owne power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the Law-maker himselfe: for every actiue ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer others from the obligation of the Law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps sine legislatoris iure voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate coactionis; Princes vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis. The subjects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politique Lawes, giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a Preident, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, that wee ought not to seeme wiser then God himselfe, who hath told vs that there are no Lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations haue their feuerall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no less than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to gouerne aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill Lawes did indeede containe in order a great part of the then knowne World, without any notable inconuenience, after such time as once it was receiued, and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundry people, which it gouerned. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion, or as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heauens; or peradventure some temper of the soile and climate, affording matter of prouocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Thieues) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo unhappily diuerced from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury reiected, because plurality of Wiues was denied vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously then seasonably. In such cases, me thinks, it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniust; there may the Law, giuen by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the cuill, which forscheth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as vnouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparel in Turkie: there may a wife and vpriht Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his Law required, euen as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeketh the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though hee be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well obscured by Master Doctor Willer, that the morall Iudicials of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that wee are tyed to the same feuerity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be aduiged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the feuerity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heauy: for to shew more rigour then Moses, becommeth not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath bene the subiect of many learned discourses, neither wil I take vpon me, to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controuerisie among worthy Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwayes bene very plausible. And surely howeuer they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue bene witness, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a Iudgement giuen against a Gentle woman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proof; for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a yeere after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistis was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) reuerently lamented: but this Iudge, faith the same Authour, Sapius ipse mihi fassus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum eius de hoc facti o ipse periret; Nec him- ca. 5. §. 3. selfe often confessed vnto me, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphisiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly by how much the subiect of the Metaphisiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferior to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisdome. To which purpose well faith Saint Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulti eternam, de qua nulli animae iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if hee be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation, then the Lord hath laide.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of Moses.

§. 1. Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness; with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troups.

When Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary, he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing seene what numbers of Men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age upwards, he appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number their conquest, besides the Beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the Law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve silver Chargers, and twelve silver Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. sheekles of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cuppes, to 120. sheekles of gold; which makes of sheekles of silver 1200. every sheekle of gold valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about foure hundredth and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all theret by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Passouer, which they performed on the foureteenth day of the second moneth of the second yeere: and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloude was lifted vp from about the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this inuocation to God: Rise to vp Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel remoued from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Pithan, the Arme, or great Squadron of Iuda, led by Naasson, taking the Vanguard, followed by Nethaneel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon; after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprt. And because the passage through so many deserts and mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leauing nothing vnthought of, which might serue for the aduancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their iourney towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great vnderstanding & iudge-^{ment} (as appeared by the Councill he gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges on the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience, for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had liued 40. yeeres in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauell: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of soules, which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to vse many guides, and many conducters. To this request of Moses, it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from Moses into his owne Countrey. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his returne to his owne Countrey, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leaue of his owne Countrey, by letting things in order, then to abide there.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

AFTER this dismissal of Hobab, Israel beganne to march towards the Deserts of Paran:⁵⁰ and after three dayes wandring, they fate downe at the Sepulchers of lust, afterward called Tubera, or Incenso: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutinies and Murmurers which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth, of the second yeere, they rested and fed themselves with Quiles (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to cast vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iune: whereof surfsauring there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, answering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazerath, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seven dayes; after whose recovery Israel remoued toward the border of Idumaea; and incamped at Rithma,⁵¹ neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discouersers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themselves of the fertility and strength of the Countrey; as also to take knowledge of the Wayes, Passages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Araad king of the Canaanites surprized diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neere those wayes, through which the discouersers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discouersers of Cades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel, whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliuerance from the

the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wildernes (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gaue them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other then the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preferred them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be slaughtered, and giuen for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Giant-like, (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anach) who were men of fearful stature, and so farre ouer-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grasshoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choole them a Capitaine: (or as they call it now adayes, an Electo) to carry them backe againe into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every soule of the whole multitude (Iosua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine foote of Idumaea, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and alluring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaued both of reason and common sense, they threatned to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the feare of his bright glory between the vnadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his seruants, preferred them thereby from their violence; threatening an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God deliuered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this so seuer a iudgement, how deservfully soeuer inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Deserts. Yet as God is no lesse iust than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand lesse heavy than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity, so by the measure of his glory (euermore ialous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to passe unpunished, reseruing his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preferre, and in them to performe his promises, which haue neuer bene frustrated.

§. III.

Of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOW when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heavy displeasure towards them, they began to bewail themselves, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the aduice of Moses; who assured them, that God was not among them; and that the Arke of his covenant should not moue, but by His direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto benedicted and rebared, was now left no lesse sharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow those counsels which carry them to their owne destructions: so the Hebrewes, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conducters offered; and might then haue entered Iudaea before their enemies were prepared and ioynted; did afterward, contrary to Gods commandement, vnder take the enterprise of themselves; and ranne head-long and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumaea. the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioynted, and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight, euen vnto Hormah: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to preuent their dilapidation and destruction threatend. Of which powerfull assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioynted together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to returne by those painefull passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came back to passe to ouer Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres, and the whole number of the 600. and oddethousand, which came out of Aegypt (Moses, Iosua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborne and careless generations were wholly worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of the discouersers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipping the Sunne and Moone in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Num. 33.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commandment receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recouer the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rishma he remoued to Reimmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuid. d. among them. From thence he went on to Lihnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Lihnah he crost the Valley, and fate downe at Refsa, nere the foote of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceclata, where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood into the Sabbath, was fencd to death. After which, Moses alwayes keeping the Valley betweene two great ledges of mountaines, (those which bound the Desert of Sinne; and those of pharan) crost the same from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapler, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence hee passed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thalab, and so to Thara or Thare, the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram; who for their contempt of God & his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp aliue; and by the Earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heauen; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest mannales and iudgements of God, that hath bene shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly swallowed vp aliue into the Earth with their families and goods, euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church and Common-wealth of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirmethem, it pleased him in this place also to approue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelue rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes; of which Moses receiued one of euery Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on euery rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron on 50 the staffe of Leui, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night, had on it both Buddes, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharab the whole Army remoued to Methra; and thence to Esmoa; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masuria, after Saint Hierome) and from Moseroth to Beneiacan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgads; thence to Setabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, betweene Madian and Asiongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Asiongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the stonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia releued the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceiued, as many times hee is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Setabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seauenth Perse, is also called Setabata, or Iotabath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adioyning. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea, at Asiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleeue, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thursty land, before they can recouer the banks of the Red Sea.

From Setabata, Moses directed his iourney towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebron, and from thence to Efiongaber: which City in Iosephus time had the name of Beneice; and in Hieroms, Eflia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, hee turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded: Efiongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses traualled in that passage.

It seemeth that Efiongaber or Asiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is saide, That the Lord spake vnto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor; nere the Coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Efiongaber, and the other places nere the Red Sea, had at this present bene subiect vnto the Idumaeans, Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumaeans obtained those places: for it is saide; And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed young Aial of Idumaea, into Aegypt, when he fled from Iothab. Likewise it is saide of Salomon, that hee made a Nauy of shippes in Efiongaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

§. V.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Efiongaber hee turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wildernesse of Zin, which is Kadesh: or in Beroth, of the children of Iacan; where they fate downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth yeere, after they left Aegypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking end at Efiongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or nere it, died Miriam or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen, by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the Earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting vngratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Land and promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of

God

Num. 20. 9.

God are without beginning; fo his mercies being without end; he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satisfied. Neuertheless, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place, therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to end the traualles of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was depoyled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine, but G O D received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seene.

Num. 33.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwise Mofera, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6, those Horites took name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mofera, which was the seauen and twentieth Mansion; and Mofera which they write Moseeroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadeshbarne towards Ezionabab, encamped at Mofera, after hee departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Bemaacan. And this Mofera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister dyed, the first being the seauen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mofera, it should haue bene written, Horiusta Mofera; Hor neere Mofera: for it is but one rooke of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mofera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as hee past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Araba, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumea, praying him that he might passe with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neereſt way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped, whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Riuer of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, hee might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Riueres, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumea herunto, Moses remembered him, that hee was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the sonnes of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Eſau his Ancestor had made warre, and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or waste his Country, but that hee would reſtraine his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea, euen for the water, which themselves or their Cattell should drinke. For Moses was commanded by God, not to prouoke the children of Eſau. But the King of Edumea knowing the strength of his owne Country, the same being neere Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountaines: and withall suspecting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entered his Country, it would rest in their willes to giue him law, resolutely refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his Country together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprize was not the conquest of Seir or Edumea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of natural vnderstanding the greatest of any man, & the skillfullest man of war that the world had, he refused fed to aduenture the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gaue but a passage to invade others; and which by reason of the feate of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendered them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

§. V. I.

Of their compassing Idumea, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

10 E therefore leauing the way of Idumea, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Deserts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Idumea, and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victory, had Moses bene infort liſt: to haue made his way by the Sword through Idumea, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolute to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egipt, before they came neerer his owne home, leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set vpon some part of the Army, which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many herds of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was euermore subiect to surpris. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, hee slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessor, which ioynd his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an ouerthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses, would haue entered Canaan from Cadeshbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy, 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are saide to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory ouer Israel, neere Cadeshbarne, or if it were his Predecessor that then prevailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea; and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue bene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entered Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deserts of Zin and Moab, and haue fitteth a wearisome and needlesse compasse, by the Riueres of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their coniecture to be valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territory lay without it, and neere the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is so feared in the South of Iudea. There is also a City of that name in Simcon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sacked the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites took their reuenge, and after they had past Iordan: Iosua then gouerning them, who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his City

Deut. c. 11. v. 5. nineteenth it to have bene otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and enellefied. Exod. c. 17. v. 16. warre decreed against him: but herof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismael eldest sonne Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petrea, called Nabathas. Nowe as Abraham besought God to blefse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelue Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betwene Haulath vpon Tigris, and Sir which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia betwene Petrea. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not vnitied, in and among themselves, but that they had their ialousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or vnitied, they were taught by the care of their owne preservation, to ioyne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumans onely denied the Hebrewes a passage: which the Moabites durst not denie: because their Countrey lay more open, and because themselves had lately bene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interiaent: and besides that, the boldness of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountaines which diuided it from Israel. Again, that which moued the Moabites in their owne reason not much to interuene. Again, that which moued the Moabites in their owne reason not much to interuene.

N. m. c. 21. v. 24.

For the Israelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and of Og his confederate, was that the Amorites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betwene the mountaines of Arabia and Jordan: But as soone as Sehon was slain, and the King of Moab, Balaam, perceived that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian as afore said, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred vp to enmity against Israel. And as for the beginning, betwene the Authors of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were prefiges of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier increased, by the memory of old grudges: and withall by some diuidaine from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Israelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being natural men, might come to giue place, much lesse to submit themselves to their inferiours, as they tooke it: and for a more aggrauation, the illiues of Esaui Princes of Edumaa, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacob taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his fathers blessing also by him: and that Jacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised, into Seir or Edumaa.

Gen. 35.
Gen. 37.
Gen. 33. 14.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remaine as a feede or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar: and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to release them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalek was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esaui tooke two wiues of that Nation: one of them was Adah, the daughter of Eloah, the Hittite, and the other Abolibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Heute, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esaui, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumaa.

Gen. 36.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Israelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proceffe of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wiues of the Canaanites which they had married: only a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euerg-living God.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Pedigree) we find foure named by Moses: and one and thirty remembered by Iosua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Heuites, &c. and so here we vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the sauen principle Family should be rooted out: and that his owne people should inherite their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choysiest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Heuites, whom Simeon and Lewi slew, together with his sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their sisters rauishment.

Gen. 34.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea, the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the wildernesse in the edge of Edumaa.

N. m. 21. 1.

The third named was Sehon King of Effelon, who before Moses arrivall had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petrea or Nabathia, and thrust them ouer Anan into the Deserts, the same whom Moses ouerthrew in the plaines of Moab: at which time he took Effelon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

The fift was Adonibezek King of the Iebusites, and of Iherusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and fetters of seauenty Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who, after Iuda and Simeon had vsed the same execution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Iherusalem where he died.

Iud. 1. Ios. 10. 2.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty yeeres, after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (encouraged by Deborah) ouerthrew, and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a male driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: they and they held a corner of Land in Nabathia: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abraham's sonne, by Cethura. Raguel (named Gethgileus or Iethres, saith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodum, Kenis in the first of Iudges, the sonne of Dechan, the grand-child of Iexan, or Iokham, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura,

He guided Moses in the Wildernesse: and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguel surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, euen now remembered.

1. Homter the Heuite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Basan
5. Adonizedek the Iebusite, King of Hierusalem

After the death of Barac, Iudges of Israel, the foure last named of these Madianite Kings, vexed Israel seuen yeeres: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8. of Iudges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himselfe laide hands vpon Zebah and Salmuna, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners: in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites, and Ismaelites.

F the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they made vnto Abraham yet the Amalekites, who together with the Madianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul gouerned Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sor vnto Hanilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelue Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur, Paran, and Sim, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue bene, and so were the Madianites;) themselves taking possession of a better soyle in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petraea. For Nabathoth the eldest of those twelue Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraea, which was very fruitfull though adioyning to the Desert, in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathaea: the same which neighboureth Iudea on the East-side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathaei (B) changed into (P).

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sonnes, gaue his owne name to the East-part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward posselt by Admasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountaines Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Plinie caruans. Abbeel fate downe in the Desert Arabia, neere the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happy: and gaue name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Misam was the Parent of the Masamancufes, neere the Mountain Zamarth, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Misima: who ioyned to the Orchens, neere the Arabian galle, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmas.

Of Duma were the Dumans, betweene the Adubens and Raabens: where the City Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Athritae, who bordered the Napathens in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Itureans, or Chamatheans: of whom Tobu was King in Dauid time.

Of Naphri the Nubeian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adaaezer commanded, while Dauid ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmoeneans: who were afterward called Asite: because they worshipped the fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Agyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans A- 30 retas, as Names of Honour. The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: when Exod. 17. of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neere Cadeshbarne. Num. 14. After the gouernment of Othoniel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Madianites: and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soone as Israel had rest, they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Agypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Hanilah to Shur.

In Dauid time they tooke Siklag in Simcon: but Dauid followed them, and surprised 1 Sam. 30. them, recouering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse.

In Ezekias time as many of them as ioyned to Edumaea were wasted and dispianted by 1 Chron. 4. the children of Simcon.

§. IIII.

Of the inauguration of ciuility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

Here, liued at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, so did Art and Ciuility (bred and fostered fare off in the East, and in Agypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Iudea. For if Pelasgus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them, withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbes and Rootes: wee may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsely those Nations haue vaunted of those their antiquities accompanied not only with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt deluto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientia doctor fuisse perhibetur, Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the inuention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inuenta sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Aeschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire, was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starrs, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art so to vnt this fire, as thereby he gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued, had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, to being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to inuestigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies, for so it is saide: Idem altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut creno calo quam longissime astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret. That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discerne as farre off the settings and risings of the Starrs: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diuersly.

Of this Mans knowledge Aeschylus giues this testimonie.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it be saide, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sonnes of Iapetus, Aeschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Evening, and so to the evening Starrs. Also besides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hek, with the Sea adioyning tooke name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were, but by those haimes to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec vero Atlas sustinere caelum, nec Prometheus affixum Caucasus, nec stellatus Cepheus cum vixore traditur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabula traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be saide to beare up heauen, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stelled; vnlesse their diuine knowledge had raised vpon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he tooke him for Saturnus, as Rheus conuinc alme Promethen. But that the story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approued Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue not doubted; For the great judgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith Saint Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archeus the sonne of Orichon challengeth the inuention. Of this Archeus Archeus in Phlegon tooke name; and therefore do the Archeus vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone. Et Luna gens priuilegiata fuit: which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Senagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequall and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesius, as it is saide, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V. Of Deucalion and Phæton.

And in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argues. This Deucalion was the sonne of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssees, makes Deucalion the sonne of Aminos: but he must needs haue meant some other Deucalion, for else either Phylus was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Phylus after his returne from Troy, fained himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Mimos: but this Mimos liued but once before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that warre) and this Deucalion the sonne of Promethus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie: by which in effect euery soule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrria his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractiue of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule finnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that generall destruction by the flood vniuersall. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrria his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be louers of Vertue, of Iustice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

*Non illa melior quisquam, nec amantior aequi
Vir fuit: aut illa reuerentior illa decum.*

No man was better, nor more iust than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Promethus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing; and aduised him to prouide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that this Story had bene but an imitation of Noahs flood deuised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and Saint Augustine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this story of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melantho, on whom Neptune is saide to haue begot Dolphus, which gaue name to Dolphus, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and maruailous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened vnder Phæton; not onely in Ethiopia, but in Libia, a Region in Italy, and about Coma, and the Mountaines of Pyrenius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BVt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus; and of the Greekes, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Augustine & Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many workes some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Aegypt, and there worshipped; one, the sonne of Nilus, whose name the Aegyptians feared to utter, as the Jewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury, which flew Argus in Greece, and flying into Aegypt, is said to have deliuered literature to the Aegyptians, and to have given them Lawes. But Diadorm affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Aegypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying, That letters were not found out by that Mercury which flew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Themet; whom Philosophus writeth Taautus; the Aegyptians Thoth, and the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanchoiastho, who liued about the warre of Troy, giues the invention of letters. But Saint Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Aegyptians, calles neither of them the sonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have slain Argus. For he finds this Mercury, the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vines vpon Saint Augustine seemes to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembred. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Græcian Mercury brought letters into Aegypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Aegypt or Phœnicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Græcian into Aegypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bœotia, either out of Aegypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that betwene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descentes cast; Crotopus King of the Argines, with whom Moses liued, and in whose time about his tenth yeere Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleuentyeres; after him Danau fifty yeeres; after him Lyncus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Aegypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Aegypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters and taught the vse of them to the Jewes; of whom the Phœnicians their Neighbors receiued them; and the Greekes of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred, that is, because the Jewes and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For euery Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, vpon part of whose workes hee Commenteth, to haue bene foure descentes after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calles Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diadorm, call the Counsailler and Instructer of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus sheweth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diadorm also affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lod. Vines vpon the fixe and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Booke of Saint Augustine, De Ciuitate Dei, conceiuet, that this Mercury, whose workes are extant, was not the first which was entituled, Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child. Sanchoiastho, an ancient Phœnician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saurme, and called by the Phœnicians, Taautus; and by the Aegyptians, Thoth, or Thot. It may be, that the many yeeres which he is said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeeres; gaue occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which haue collected the grounds of the Aegyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inuentor of the Aegyptian Wisdom, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurius or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in manie particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the aprouing of Images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoever shall read him with an euen iudgement, will rather resolute, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Aegyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and Spirit deuised. For there is no man of vnderstanding, and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrarie in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reuerend and diuine, vnto almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had bene found in all things like themselves: I thinke it had not bene perilous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Aegyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuised by the first, and more ancient Mercurius, which others haue thought to haue bene Ioseph, the son of Iacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaohs dreames, they called Saphanaphane, which is as much to say, as abconditorum repertor; a finder out of hidden things. But these are ouer-vnturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Entire & aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scriptis libros, & quidem multos, ad coemulandum diuinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Maestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, isdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hec habet vnum librum, in quo exprimitur the knowledge of diuine things, in which hee affirmeth the Almightie of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which wee do. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets.

And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Aegyptians and Græcians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whosoever is found in him contrary therunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: contrary therunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eius esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding, most perfect, and generatiue, and operative, falling vpon fraisfull nature, made it also fraisfull and producing. And hee was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate vnum esse Deum asserens; Because hee spake of the Trinitie, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie. Hic rursus (saith Ficinus) prauis priscæ Religionis, hic ortum nouæ fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic statum iudicium, resurrectionem seculi, bestiarum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercurius foresaw the ruine of the olde or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the coming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will onely adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volterran out of Suidas. Hæcenus suspensus à patria, vixit peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumq; post paulum à robis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote me quasi mortuum iugatus: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Ciuitatem regredior, ad quam vniuersi perueniunt: moris condicione venturi sunt. Ibi namq; solus Deus existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita, Nitherto, O Sonne, being driuen from my Country, I haue liued a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safety. And when I shall after a few daies (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood depart from you, see that you doe not beuile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the only God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with a sweetest more then marvellous:

image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likenes of those things, which are amongst vs: That therefore (all deuising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Aegyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Aegyptians; and was mighty in his works and words; the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diadorm, Diogenes, Laertius, Lamblicus, Philo Iudeus, and Eusebius Cesariensis, and diuided into four parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

In the Mathematical part, which is distinguish'd into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick; the ancient Aegyptians exceeded all others. For Geometrie which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was vsfull vnto them: because it consisteth of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely overflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Countrey being a lowell and spacious Plaine, free and cleere from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starrs.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripatetickall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starrs haue a certaine soaue heat; and temperate influences, wherby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and be from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper fashions, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisdom, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleaueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first origin in Aegypt; partly by means of the temperatenesse of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensive; and partly through the fertilitye, that Niles giueeth in those places; That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue bene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, haue bene Deities; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they prevailed ouer their enemies. Moreover, the Aegyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this later Aegyptian learning into three fewell sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is exprest by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figuratiue words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participeth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other symbolically, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropicall, and Enigmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropicall or transferent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and of men. So with the Aegyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone: by

by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skillfulnesse: by a Lyon, Fortitude: by a Horfe, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be vnderstood: Enigmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lyons body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all diuine things are Enigmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresth that the Sunne nourisheth Meteors in the Ayre, aswell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Ear, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Gouverning all things. The Scythians are thought to haue been delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherecydes Syrus reporteth, That when Darius lending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, vnlesse he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthura returned to him a Moufe, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the moufe, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were signified to be ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Hyphades made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creepe into holes as a moufe, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues, Till his grounds. The same History is little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus deuised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Aclepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration, aswell (saith Sextus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearfull day of Iudgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Lamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Aegyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menanius, affirmeth that this Mercury was not onely the Inuentor of the Aegyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called, the Wisdom of the Aegyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that subiect 36525. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Ficy Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Awcull Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Aegyptians language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Greek, they seemed to haue bene first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Aegyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physick sixe bookes; of the orders of Priests ten; and of Astrology foure.

6. VIII.

A Brieve of the History of Iosua; and of the space betwene him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Iosua: and of the breach of Faith.

After the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egression, in the first month called Nisan, or March, Iosua the sonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, tooke on him the gouernment of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Jordan, and to possesse, and diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iosua's rule Saint Augustine dates with the reigne of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Cerax the sixteenth King in Sydonia, when Darius gouerned the Argives; and Erichonius, Athens.

Iosua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent ouer Jordan certaine discouersers to view the feate and strength of Jerico, the next City vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which he was to passe ouer. Which discouersers being faued, and sent backe by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because shee kept a Tauerne or Vtling-houle, made Iosua know that the Inhabitants of Jerico, and those of the Countrey about it, hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egression, Iosua remoued from Sittim in the plaines of Mob, and drew downe his Armie to the bankes of the Riuer Jordan, and gaue them commandement to put themselves in order to follow the Arke of God, and when the Leuites tooke it vp, and moued towards the Riuer; giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his fauour and prefence who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Jordan should be cut off and diuided, and the waters coming from aboue should stand still in a heape, whereby thiof below towards the Dead sea wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

Hee also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice and equallitie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the bankes of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first month Nisan, or March, they past ouer to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the drie ground in the midst of the Riuer: which, for a memorie of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Citie of Ierico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Iosua gaue commandement, that all borne in the last fortieth yeere in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremonie to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giueth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their remouing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they liued by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same Month, the children of Israel celebrated the Passouer now the third time; first, at their leauing Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrie, and hating, as it were, sunked on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sihon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, hee gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, kuben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands ouer Jordan; Secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse; about the fifth yeere of his gouernment; proued in the 14. of Iosua, v. 10. and that third diuision was made to the other seuen Tribes at Shilo, where Iosua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his owne books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Regulus of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to write themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Gouernours God hath taken away all wisdom and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue been quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such time as Ierico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed, fiftie of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Iosua. Onely fve (the rest looking on to the successe) namely, the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Armie being by Iosua surpris'd and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, sight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caue vnder ground, were thence by Iosua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also tooke Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Iosua posselt himselfe of Eglon, Itebron, and Delbir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countreies were posselt, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the o-uer-late counsailes of necessity, vnited themselves, to make one grosse strength and body of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Iosua di- covered, as the same rested nere the Lake of Merom, he vied such diligence, as he came on them vnwares; and obtaining absolute victory ouer then, he prosecuted the fame to the vttermost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabit and enioy.

Secondly, I note, that Iosua shewed himselfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he vied the straggling of an ambush in taking of ai; and in that hee broke the Armies of the first fve Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surpris. For hee marched all night from his campe at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day, when he ouerthrew Iabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the Riuer Jordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Israel past it with a drie foote; the fall of Ierico by the sound of the Hornes; the shewres of Haile-stones, which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished than by the sword of Israel: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lengthened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the ouerthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke onely proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage between Iosua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euasion, it admitteth no distinction, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Aquiuocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Heuites, exprelly and by name, by the commandement of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and coun-terfeits, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Iosua, and the Princes of Israel, by faining to bee sent as Embassadors from a farre Countrie, in which trauaile their clothes were worn; their bread mouldie, which they aowed to haue been warme for newnesse when they first set out; their barrels and bottels of wine broken; their shoes parcht; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Iosua hauing swoine vnto them by the Lord God of Israel, hee durst not, though vrged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but hee spared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Iosua had it. For first, the commandement which he receiued from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, hee might iustly haue put these men to the sword, and haue sackt their Cities; if there be any euasion from a promise made, whereof the liuing God is called to witnesse. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gaue peace, because hee knew them to be a people hated of God. Hee told them, that if they were of the Heuites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gaue faith, & to a Nation which came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and ouer Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, it is accord, which Israel made with these craftie Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleued what they had said, and thus sold out with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and setted those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apostle Re-uerence, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the winnesse of the true God, in whom they beleued not. I say therefore, that if euer man might haue seld himselfe by any euasion or distinction, Iosua might iustly haue done it. For hee needed not not in this case the helpe of Aquiuocation, or Mentall Reservation. For what hee sweare, he sweare in good Faith; but he sweare nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuioable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworne it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse mentake it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we feare him not, and that we set him at nought, and despise him. If hee that without Reservation of honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, promisseth in his name, and makes him a witnesse of the Couenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which haue bene made in former times, and confirmed by publike faith. For though it were 400. yeeres after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people defended of the Gibeonites: yet God who forgat not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieued, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to refuse in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trialls of right, will not onely be made vnertaine, but all the chaines, whereby free men are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that wee enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised: I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandments in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That hee breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whose ouer hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holie Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Agypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holie Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadach, and his Vicegerent, The Soldan Sanar, who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Syracen to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after hee had made Agypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holie Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which curseth them, shall be the soule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lye? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victory ouer Amurath the Turk; and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantageous that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his Faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet hee lost the battaile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bec it against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oaths now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To be Thorns in their eyes to proue them, and to teach them to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforst to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of hardest access. And those of Iuda were not able to be Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Iudges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistines as Azzab, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Jordan expell the Geshuinites, nor the Manachites: which inhabited the North parts of Basam, afterward Tracanis.

Nor the Xaphalims possesse the midlues of Bethlehem; nor of Bethanah; but they inforst those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Aton, Athab, Achab; Heliab, Aphike, and Rehol, nor inforce them to tribute.

Nor were could Zabulon enioy Kiron, and Nahalol, but receiued tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gazer among the Ephraims; and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taanach, Dor, Ikem, and Beit. Atgad; yet Thersalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend about foure hundred yeeres, euen till Dauids time.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeeres, euen the one of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not exprest in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him fixe and twentie yeeres, Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie: And Masseus fixe and twentie: Matthias cited by Atkins fourtene: Iannes Lucidus, seuentene: Claudianus, ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen & twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melanchton, two and thirtie: Cadman, fixe and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeeres from the deliuerie of Israel out of Agypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that wee allow to Iosua onely eightene of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwife, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approved opinion.

The time necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Agypt vnto the building of the Temple, continueth of error, such as haue inserted yeeres betweene Iosua and Othniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeeres, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapter vpon Iosua: Bunting reckons it nine yeeres: Bucholzer and Reusner but one, Cadman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no void yeeres found betweene Iosua and Othniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eightene ascribed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The prayles and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the fixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord?

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, v. 26. And Iosua wrote these words in the booke of the law of God: which seemeth rather to haue been meant by the couenent which Iosua made with Israel in Shechem, where they all promised to serue & obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Claudian and Ablensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceiue that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iustorum, remembered by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these words of the 26. verse, And Iosua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it, for when the people had answered Iosua; The Lord our God wil we serue, & his voice wil we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a couenent with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

There

There liued at once with Iofua, Erichonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beaſts together, thereby to till the ground with more eaſe and ſpeed: And about the ſame time the ſittie Daughters of Danaius (as it is ſaid) ſlew the ſittie Sonnes of Aegyptus, all but Lyncus who ſucceeded Danaius, if the tale be true. There liued alſo with Iofua, Phenix, and Cadmus, and neere the end of Iofus life, Iupiter is ſaid to haue raiſed Europa the Daughter of Phenix, (afterward married to Aſterius King of Creta) and begot on her Minos, Radamantius, and Sarpedon. But S. Auguſtine reports this raiſement to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, & Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the warre of Troy, and Sarpedon was in perſon a young or ſtrong man at the ſame Troian war. And ſo doth Neflor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greeks, Theſeus and Perithous for men of Antiquitie, and of ages paſt: Minos being yet more ancient than any of theſe. But hereof elſewhere.

§. I.

The Proſeme to the deſcription of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Expoſition of the name of Syria.

THE ſtorie of the Judges ought to follow that of Iofua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Iewes was governed by Kings, of which fo many of them as ruled theſe tenne Tribes, ſhall be remembered when we come to the deſcription of Samaria: but becauſe the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greateſt part of the Story paſt, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderſtanding of both) to make a Geographicall deſcription of thoſe Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be vnderſtood, and conceiued. To which purpoſe (beſides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue beſtowed on euery Tribe his proper portion: and doe ſhew what Cities and Places of ſtrength were by the Iewes obtained: and what numbers it pleaſed God to leaue vnconquered; by whom hee might correct and ſcourge them, when vngratefull for his many graces, they at ſundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored thoſe deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Diuina uonitas (ſaith Auguſtine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc ſeculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalia adhibet ſeuertatem, ne aeternam uultu inferat ultionem; The Diuine goodneſſe is eſpecially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully uſe temporal ſeuertie, that it may not iuſtly bring vpon vs eternal vengeance.

To the Cities herein deſcribed, I haue added a ſhort Story of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-wealths: and to helpe my ſelfe herein, I haue perſuaded diuers of the beſt Authors vpon this ſubiect: among whom, becauſe I finde ſo great diſagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in ſuch caſes aduented to follow mine owne reaſon, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And becauſe Canaan, with Paleſtina of the Philiftines, and the Lands of Og and Sihon Kings of Baſan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but ſmall Prouinces of Syria: it ſhall be neceſſarie, firſt to diuide and bound the generall, and ſo to deſcend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the laargeſt deſcription, and as it was anciently taken, embraced all thoſe Regions from the Euxine Sea to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus, called Leucogryians, or white Syrians. But taking it ſhorter, ſhorter, and from the coaſt of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumea towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne riſing, and the Mediterranean Sea Weſtward: it then containeth beſides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Deſert, and Arabia Petraea, that Region alſo which the Greekes call Meſopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuer, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for ſo Aram Nahairaijm is expounded: alſo Padan Aram: that is, Iugum Syria, becauſe the two Riuer goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edelſa, ſometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many ſmall Prouinces, as Celeſyria which the Latines call Syria Cana, becauſe it lay in that fruitful Valley betwene the Mountaines of Lybanus and Antioch, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were ſeated. Then Damaſcena or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damaſcus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall ſeat of the Adades, the firſt Kings of Syria. Adjoining to it was the Prouince of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: ouer which Adadezer commanded in Salomons time. Then Phenicia and the people Syrophonices: and laſtly Syria Paſſina bordering Aegypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Iudaea alſo a part: and ſo to that Prouince which Mofes calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Melaguch the name of Syria Iudaea.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan, and of the promiſes touching this Land.

BUT that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phenicia, and ſtretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Deſerts betwene Idumea and Aegypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the Weſt, and the Mountaines of Herman; Galaad and Arnon towards the Eaſt: the ſame Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Tracoonis, and Ptolomie Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan, the Sonne of Cham, & lingua appellata ſuit Canaan: The language was alſo called Canaan, ſaith Montanus: and after Hebraea of the Hebrewes: who tooke name from Heber, for a long time no certain abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Aegyptians called Hebraei, as it were paſſengers, which is alſo the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eufebius long before them both. It had alſo the name of Iudaea from Iuda; and thence afterwards intuled The holy Land, becauſe therein our Sauour Chriſt was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure; namely, into Edom, (otherwiſe Seir, or Edumaea) Galilee, Samaria, and Iudaea. Galilee is double, the ſuperior called Gentium, and the inferior; and that Galilee and Iudaea are diſtinguiſhed, it is plaine in the Scriptures, though both of them belong to Phenicia.

Now beſides theſe prouinces of Phenicia, and Paleſtina (both which the River of Iordan boundeth; ſauiug that Phenicia ſtretcheth a little more Eaſtward towards Damaſcus) that part alſo to the Eaſt of Iordan, and within the Mountaines of Herman, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwiſe Traconi, fell to the poſſeſſion of haile Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan alſo: aſwell becauſe anciently poſſeſt by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enioyed by the Iſraelites, which Eaſtmoſt parts are againe diuided into Baſan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and parts are againe diuided into Maſſabi, Geſſuri, Argobe, Hos. They are knowne to the latter Cof-mographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Traconi, Pertia, Batanea, &c. of which I will ſpeake in their proper places.

But where Mofes deſcribeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genetiſ, hee maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, for theſe be his words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou commeſt to Gerar vntill Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goeſt vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Sebojm, euen vnto Laſba: by which words Mofes ſetteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean. But in Deuteronomie it ſeemeth to be far more large: for it is therein written All the places whereon the ſole of your feet ſhall tread, ſhall be yours: Deut. 34. 2

your coast shall be from the wilderness and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, vnto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrey North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azzah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petraea, and the Desert as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possesse, nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue thereby the River Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosua: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holie Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For Dauid did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babilonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countreies giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods they themselves also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the laste inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heu-
 uens were about the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verbes preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other then all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perseuer in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eight Verse of the eleventh of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written, Therefore shall ye keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possesse the Land, whither ye goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord swaue vnto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heauens were about the earth. For if ye keepe diligently, saith hee, all these commandements, which I command you to doe, that ye, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possesse great Nations, & mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Maieutie, to the Idolatrie of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For, saith hee, Ostendit promissionem precipuam non esse de hoc Politico regno; Hethemeth that his chiefe promise is not of a ciuill Kingdome. To which agrees that answer, which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he ouerthrew the reputation of the Jewes Storie, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viuendum terram que in celis est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the liuing which is in Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. miliarium, latitudinem vero 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, vrbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam à Iudeis occupata, sed tantum diuina pollicitatione promissa; because the whole Countrey of the Jewes is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, & 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countreies, places, Cities, & many Townes, which the Jewes neuer possesse, but were onely granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Esay touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where hee hath these words: De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palaestina Regione petendam: quotius Provincia determinata est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur situs: ita vix celestibus utatur pluuij, & raritatem fontium cisternarum extruccionem soletur: sed in Deserta quidam dicitur. Iesimauerunt struccionem eius; From whence, saith hee, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palaestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, & stragled with with cragie Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preferneth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building of Cisternes; but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened: so farre S. Hierome, where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neg, hoc dico in suggestionem terra Iudee, ut Hereticus Sycephanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historie veritatem: qua fundamentum est intelligentie spiritualis, sed ut decutiam supercilium Iudeorum: qui Synagoga angustis latitudini Ecclesie preferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum significantem: ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neyther (saith hee) say I this to disgrace the land of Iudaa (as the Hereticall Iycophant doth belime) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spirituall veritatem; Neyther (saith hee) the pride of the Jewes: which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honnie.

By this it may also be gathered, how focuer it be vnlike (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the littell sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East bound, should be taken onely in a spirituall sense) yet neuertheless that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be vnderstood for Euphrates: and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephthali, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phoenicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to bee mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuerly expressed, so that to the vnskillfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuersitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined others vowels then now the Hebrew editions haue; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe thinke fit.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

 He Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men about twenty yeeres of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the Riuer of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phoenicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolemais Acon along the Sea-coast: containing thirte English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though Aptinus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheare, besides the Balsamm, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, Asher pinguis panis: Concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat: And he shall giue pleasures for a King.

Of Zidon.

The first City Remed on the North border of the Territorie of Asher, was Zidon, which the Greeks call the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greekes and

But that it was more remote ancient, Mosef, Iofus, and Iosephus witness, the same being found by Zidon the eldest of Canaan Sonnes: and so strong it was in Isaiah time, as neither did him self attempt it, neither could the Assyrians, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ, a City interchangeably gourned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was at last destroyed by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth between it and Tyre, the distance betweene which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, which Seiqlerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betweene these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer-difficult to deuise any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

Strabo and Plinie give the Zidonians the intimation of "Glaffe," which they vied to make of those lands which are taken out of the Riuat Belus, falling into the Mediterranean Sea, neere Palomitis or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those Glasse which they make at Murano; of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon infirmis artifice tuxtri: Zidon vittrarijs officinis Nobilis: Zidon a famous Glassemaker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse-boales.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal p and Astartoth; which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pinde gathers out of 1.Sam. 31. 10. and Iud. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accompanied the Gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1. Kings 11. 5. in the florid of Salomon's Idolatry: where Astartoth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story veneration commonly worshipped of the Affrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Affars or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel did not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Aegyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Ofride; that Osiris was the Aegyptians is called Amuz: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jewes: who had beene taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeeres, whereof our Sauour in Matthew and Luke: Wo be to the Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agoe, &c. but I say vnto thee, it shall be easier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of iudgement, than for you.

It received a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaises, who came with a Fleet to visit the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recovered, the commandment thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And again in the yeere 1250. it was redified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turkes, and hath the name of Zai.

†. III.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

¹⁰ Sarepta, or after the Hebrew Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Nar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neare it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, Quæq; Sareptano palmitè missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, saith Postellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of Shippes commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians crected Puta, Leptus, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyrij ienuere Coloni, Carthago. Virgil. l. 1 Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In thmia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iofua the 19. taking name from the situation; because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, Collect. l. c. 6 as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra, for Virgil collect the purple of Tyre, Ofrum Sar- yannum, by which name Iofued and Silius remember it. The Zidoniens built it upon a high Hill, wherof many ruines remaine to this day: the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidoniens, the Prophet

Eſay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon, which Tragus also confirmeth, though Heraſus by affinity of name makes Thir as the ſonne of Iaphet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for ſomuch the Prophet Eſay ſo witneſſeth, Is not this your glorious City, whoſe antiquity is of ancient dayes?) yet, that Thir as the ſonne of Iaphet ſet himſelfe in the boſome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I ſee nothing to perſwade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times ſo renowned, ſeemeth to be the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Iosephus, and Eusebius make this City elder than Salamons Temple 240. yeeres: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyrus the wife of Agenor gaue it her name: but of Agenor I will ſpeake more at large in the ſtory of their Kings.

For ſtrength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receiue Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Iland, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middest of the Sea, as ſome read, or as others in the inner-moſt part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it ſituate at the entry of the Sea, as also the ſame Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Eſay a Mart of the Nations: and ſo Proude, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Eſay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in le-aring, and in manu-facture: eſpecially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, ſaith Iulius Pollux, was firſt found out by Hercules Dogge, who paſſing along the Sea-coſt, and eating of the Fiſh Conchilia or Purpura: the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worſhipped the ſame Idols that Zidon did: ſaith that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrans preſented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, deſiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a ſacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Anceſtor of the Macedonians Kings: and muſt therefore enter it. Whereupon they ſent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony: but this auailed not. For Alexander was not ſo ſuperſtitious, as ambitious; he deſired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ſhips as he could, and brought from Tibanus ſo great a number of Cedars, and ſo many weighty ſtones, from the old City of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often waſt away with the ſtrength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he neuer reſted, till hee had made a ſoore paſſage from the Continent to the Iland: and hauing once approached their Walles, he ouer-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing Spirit of reſolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that reſiſted; after which he cauled 2000. more to be brought in a ranke all along the Sea-shore: which execution vpon cold blood he performed (as ſome Authours affirme) vpon the iſſues of thoſe ſlaues which had formerly ſlaine all their Maſters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themſelves. This victory of Alexander ouer the Tyrans, Iosephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat reuolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the laſt Satrapa or Prouinciall Governour, which Darius ſeated in Samaria: the ſame who hauing married his Daughter to Manaſſe, brother to Taddus the high Prieſt of Hieruſalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine Gabrizim ouer Samaria: that the forces of the Tewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Prieſthood he beſtowed on his ſon in law Manaſſe, whom the Tewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander beſieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius ſo calleth Sanabala, died.

Long before this deſolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanaſſer the Aſſyrian King: when the growing pride of the Aſſyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the reſt of Syria, became enuious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He beſieged it both on the Land ſide, and with threeſcore ſhippes of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any ſupply of men might enter it: but the Tyrans with twelve ſaile ſcattered that ſcete, andooke 500. priſoners of the Aſſyrians: notwithstanding, the Aſſyrian continued his reſolution, and lay before before it by his Lieutenants ſiue yeeres, but with ill ſucceſſe. And this ſiege Menander E- phesus, cited by Iosephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrans (which the ſaide Menander conuerted into Greeke) adding, that the Annals, whom Tyrinus calleth Helisus, was then King of Tyre, hauing gouerned the ſame Elamians, whom Tyrinus calleth Salmanaſſar, and about 200. yeeres ſix and twenty yeeres. Soone after this reſulſe of Salmanaſſar, and about 200. yeeres before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at ſuch time as he deſtroyed Hieruſalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeede gaue to Alexander the example of that deſpairefull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the ſtrength of the Sea, the ſame caſtyle and paſſage was againe broken downe, and demolliſhed.

Againſt Nabuchodonosor, for many yeeres, the Tyrans defended themſelves: for ſo long did theſe Babylonians continue before it, As euery head was made bald, and euery ſhoulder made bare, ſaith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Eſay had maniſtly foretold the deſtruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirtene yeeres ſiege or more, the Tyrans deſpoiled of all their hopes, and remembring ouer-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number of ſhippes, abandoned their City, tranſporting with themſelves the ableſt of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches ſayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: ſo as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to ſatiſfie ſo many labours and perils, or any perſon vpon whom to auenge themſelves for the loſſe of ſo many bodies in that Warre: It pleaſed God in recompence thereof (who ſtrengthened this reſolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Agyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the ſpoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God lea- ueth not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternal happineſſe reſerued for his Seruants and Saints: yet ſuch is the boundleſſe goodneſſe of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall bleſſings.

Now of this enterpriſe of Nabuchodonosor againſt Tyre, prophane Hiſtorians haue not bene ſilent. For both Diocles, and Philoſtratus (as Iosephus citeth them) the one in his ſecond Booke, the other in his Phenician Hiſtorie, remember it.

After theſe two great Viſitations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this City of Tyre repaired and recovered it ſelfe againe: and continued in great glory about 300. yeeres, vnto the coming of our Saviour Chriſt; and after him flouriſhed in the Chriſtian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbiſhop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Hieruſalem onely, who within his owne Dioceſſe and fourtene great Cities, with their Biſhops and Suffragans: namely Caſpha, otherwiſe Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolemais, Sarepta, Zidon, Caſarea, Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthoſia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Torſoſa) and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the reſt of that beautilfull Region of Phenicia and Paleſtina, ſubiected to the cruell and faithleſſe Saracens. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whole tyranny it ſuffered with the other Paleſtine Cities 488. yeeres.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hieruſalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Guermonde, Patriarke of Hieruſalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the ſecond, with the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was againe recovered, and ſubiected to the Kings of Hieruſalem, and ſo it remained 165. yeeres.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladine hauing firſt taken Hieruſalem, removed his whole Army and ſate downe before Tyre: drawing his fleet of ſhippes and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Chriſtian power.

The Citizens finding themſelves reduced into great famine, and many other miſeries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens ſhips, and ſallying out reſolutely vpon his armie, ſlew ſo great numbers of them, and ſol- lowed their victory with ſuch fury, as that the Saracens forſaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great diſorder and diſhonour. Two yeeres after which victory the body of that famous Fredericke Barbaroſſa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Chriſtians enemies ouer a Riuer vnſoordable, periſhed by the weight of his armour therewith) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garniſhed and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeeres before before therein buried: but in the yeere 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turkes.

†. IIII.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

The third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Afferites could not obtaine on the South bound of Affer was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomy. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Cath, or Cod, and by Zoglerus it is called Hadipos.

But lastly, it was intitled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Aegyptian Ptolomies: which City also as it is, 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, insidiously wrested from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra daughter of the Eide Ptolome not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabaeus treacherously surprized and slaine, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidiousnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus punished, as it is in the Story ensuing: and by like reason about the same time was the aforecited Alexander in the warre against Demetrius, one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolome toynd, overthrowne & treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolome: who enioyed not the glory of his victory and treason about three dayes, for God struck him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seat; two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the Port for safety and capacity not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Ierusalem some foure and thirty miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Caistrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middle of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Belzebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called Pharus in Egypt: to giue comfort in the night to those shippes, which came neere and fought that part. It had in it a Bishop's seat, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the yeere 636. (a fatall yeere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Maomars the Saracen. In the yeere 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the reuenue was given in recompence. Againe, in the yeere of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourescore and seuen, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeere of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and delivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeere 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sacked, and vnto this demolished: though in some for afterward redified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was borne: the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were driven to make such an erection vpon a fable, or person fained. The place is described by Arichomius in his description of Affer, to haue beene in the fields of Libanus: betwene the Riuer Adonis, and Zidon: his owne wordes are these:

these: *Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant inclytum Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asseruisse: eamq; mactat a bestia parente restituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata. In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not farre from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deede a Church was after built there: Thus farre Arichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodowicus Roman. Patric. Nauigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorically, figuring the victory of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.*

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Betweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazab, which Saint Hierome calleth Achzaph, and Iosephus Ecdappos, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Afferites. Belforsst findes Acziba: and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelve fearchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauielled as farre to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Berothe which by Ezekiel cap. 47. verse 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Hadadbezzer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. chap. and 8. verse, and chap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Afferites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achzaph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbab, and Aphkek did.

This Aphkek it was, whose wall falling downe, slew seuen and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Abah. Here Iunius finds that the Phylistims encamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Aphkek there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue beene in Iuda. Of which Ios 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reads, Foruer, for ym Aphkek. Where others conuert it, Percutens Syros in Aphkek.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betwene Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the yeere of Christ 1157. when he vnderooke the recovery of Tyre.

Not much about a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentifull Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of living Waters: from whence not only all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawne: but the same Spring, which hath not about a bow-shot of ground to trauiell till it recover the Sea, driueth fixe great Milles in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achzaph, or Acab, or after Saint Hierome Acisapha City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iosua, at the waters of Merom.

†. VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

Farther into the Land towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Easter-most Hilles of Tyre, in the yeere 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recovery of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the third, King of Iherusalem, lyeth buried: There were fixe Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer: where whereof foure are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum Lameperis, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium, and Belfort: The first neere the Sea vnder the Hilles of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and Fellowship of the Teutonic, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gaue succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens posselt the best part of the vpper Galilee) the chiefe of which Order was in Prothmais Acon. The first Fortresse was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the Riuer Naar, neere the City Rama: of which in this Tribe Isa. 19. 2. 9. for which the Palga reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castele of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great losse and dishonour repelled.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which Saint Hierome calleth Chabal, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rechob) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod, furnished the Afcalo nite built) making it of the Territory of Chabal, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Weissenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, feared hereabout, which Salomon presented vnto him in recompence of those promotions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others thinke this Chabal or Cabal, containing a circuit of those twenty Cities giuen to Hiram, to haue bene without the compass of the holy Land: though bordering Affer on the North-side: as it is faide, 1 Reg. 9. 11. that they were in Reuene Lemitis: that is, in lemite Regionis, in the border of the Countrey: for it was not lawfull, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howfoeuer, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appeares 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it comes they were conquered by Daul from the Syri Rechabae, whose City Roob or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equall distance from the Castele of Thoron, they place the Cities of Gisfala, and Gadara of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Jordan: Gisfala was made famous by Iohn the sonne of Leui, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred Thiuees, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Iudaea by honorificus Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly indigner'd: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This Iohn betraying in all he could the City of Gisfala (whereof he was natiuo) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gaue opportunity during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time forsooke, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward redred to Titus by composition. They find also the Cities of Cana Maior, and * Cades, (or Cedeffa) of the first was that Syro-phenician, whose Daughter Christ deliuered of the euill Spirit. Neere the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabicus ouerthrew the Army of Demetrius.

There are besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Affer, diuers others: as Bethlagan, and Betheme, standing on the South border betwene Affer and Zabulon: on the North side ioyning to Syro-phenicia, is the City of Heibalon, or Chethlon, the utmost of the holy Land that way: vnder which towards the Sea is Chali, and then * Enoch supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his sonne Enoch, but without probability, as I haue formerly proued: there are others also besides these, as Ammon or Chammon, of which Isa. 19. 2. 3. where also we read of Nehel, Rama, Alamalec, and Beton: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Haddon, and Kechob, and Misheal, which wee haue already mentioned, were by the Afferites giuen to the Leuites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Indges 1. 30. to which out of Iosua wee may adde Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

Of the Riuer and Mountaines of Affer.

THE Riuer to the North of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Cann, to which Ziegler ioyneeth Lycus, Ptolomeus, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus: which Riuer of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere vnto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding, where Ptolomeus doth, betwene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called sons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which hee also citeth Plinie, and the first of Machabees the 11. Chapter, but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Affer: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Balanea, witnesseth Ptolomeus: and therefore Pmetus calleth it Valania, and Positellus Pe- lani: which Riuer boundeth Phenicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: of Tyrolis. There is also another Riuer described by Adrichome, named Iepthael, which I finde in no other Authour, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word * Ghe which is added there to Iepthael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Valgar, the Genesus, and Arius Montanus turneit. There is also found in Affer, the Riuer of Belus, remembered by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called pagidas, saith * Plinie: out of the fands of this Riuer are made the best Glasse, which sometime the Zidonians practised: and now the Penetians at Murana. Arius Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Cendenua, as all Cosmographers both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Trauailers into those parts witnesseth. It is true that the Riuer of Chisfont taketh water from Chedumim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South betwene Caphis and Sicaminius, witnesseth Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Besides these Riuer there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of Iuving waters adioyning to Tyre: and * Maserephot, or after Saint Hierome, Maserephotaim, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by feeling the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mountaines which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Calefryia: two great ledges of Hilles, which from the Sea of Phenicia extend themselves farre into the Land East-ward: foure hundred stadia of furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giueth to the Valley of Calefryia: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giues them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Theiophoon, or Desfacies, neere Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Ara bis beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desert Arabia are called Hermom: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phenicians Syrion, and the Amorites Sanir, neither is this any one Mountainie apart, but a continuation of Hilles: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being full a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Ezekey proueth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of those Hilles of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Traconitis: and Ptolomeus of Hippus. Arius Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Affer, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giueth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are covered with Snow all the Summer, the Hebrew word Libanos (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whiteneffe. Others call them by that name of the Franksenke which those Trees yield: because Libanus is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphrodisius affirmeth, that on Libanus, there falleth a kinde of hony dew, Nig. pag. 53. which is by the Sunne congealed into hard sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

F F

The

The Rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoea, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountaines of Affer, are those Hills about Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountaine of Abarim, in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

§. IIII.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTHALIM.

†. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THe next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephthaim, the fonne of Jacob by Billa, the land-made of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to beare armes, numbered at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their Sonnes so 45400. besides, Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twenty yeeres of age. The Land of Nephthaim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fontaines of Jordan, and the Hillies of Tabanus adioyning, as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and on the East and South-east by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adjoining to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract and vnder Libanus, was the City of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountains adjoining shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. Poissellus calles it Babec; Niger, Marbec; and Leonclausus, Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldean Paraphrast, otherwise Bethshemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Pomus Solis; the City of the Sunne: into which, faith Plinian, Senerius the Roman Emperour sent a Colonne: the other Gestilius nameth Deidmarach: of this name Stephelinus also findeth a City in Thrace; and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is alſo in the ſame Valley adjoining to Nephtalim, Chaleis, and Aſila. Chaleis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcedica, over which Heraclius, Arripa, and Berenice the Queene commanded.

Abila allogate name to the Region adjoining, of which Lyfanius the sonne of Tiro the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Ptolomee gaue it the addition of Lyfani, and called it Abila Lyfani. Volaterran names it Apila, of which he notes that one ⁴⁰ Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was native, who by Volaterran is intitled Aphileus, not Aleus. After that this City of Abila or Apila, had received the Christian Faith, Proculus became the Bishop thereof: whose name afterward by our British Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this City (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered that in the Tribe of ⁴⁵ Manasse, ioyning upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephthali, there is another City of the same name, fauing that it is written with an (F) for an (T) and called Abela, remembred in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same ⁵⁰ Iosephus calles Abelmacha, and Hierome Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel for distinction like it is written, Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Towne of Mahaca, the wife of Maier the sonne of Manasse, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This City Ioab besieged: because Seba the sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against Dauid, fled thenceforth to succour: but a certaine wife woman of the City perfwading the people to cast Seba his head ouer the wall, Ioab retired his Army. The same City was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglathphalzar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground, and therefore no marvell, that many Townes (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for even of bewailing many places tooke name, as Bochim, Judg. 2.4.

and so doubtlesse * Abel-Misraim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Iunius in his note vpon Num. 33. * And Abel 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plaine ground there (to Sam. 6. 1.
w^h in the Land of Maab), and so perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Reg. 2. 24 Towne of Elizba the Prophet: also Abel-Vinayur of the Ammonites, whither Sephia pur- Reg. 29. 15 sued them. Magnum. 11. 35.

Of Hazer.

10 In this Tribe of Nephthim, was that famous City of Iabin, in Iofua's time called Afor (or after the Chaldean Paraphrasis, Hafzor) by Iofephus, Afora; by Ianinus, * Chafzor: which Laetician names Hefrom, the Regall City, and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in the West this name in the part of Nephthim, towards Asher. In this City was that great Rendevow, and assembly of 6, 5, 1. Orest thofe foure and twenty Kings against Iofua: who being all overthrowne, slaine, and fcar- 26, 1. Ben tured, this their powerfull City was by Iofua taken and burnt to dust. But in proceffe of time the fame being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a second King Iabin, 137. yeeres after the death of this first Iabin, invaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable servitude twenty yeeres, till Deborah the Prophetesse overthrowne Sifera, Iabins Lieutenant, and his Army, neereth 20 Mountain Tabor. This City Salomon restored at such time as hee also reedified Gazar, burnt by Pharao of Aegypt, with a Megeide, Belthorom, and other Cities; but about 260. yeeres after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphal a King, of the Assyrians. It is now, Hafan in Armenia, called Autiopia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. There is a North East of this name of this name in the Territory of Beniamin, seated on the confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazor, ^b Haier Heme.

Chatfar-Sufma, of which, 1 Chron. 4:37. which also is called Chatfar-Sufa, and Chatfar-Gadda, and lastly, Chatfar-Shu'eb, another City of Simoon. fol. 12, 3. a 2 Kings 9. b Hieron. loc. Hebr. l. E. Out of Nebem. 12. 33. as it seems.

t. II.

Of Casarea Philippi.

There was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephthelim, that renowned City of Lais, or Lajsch, as Zunius writes it, or Lechem, which City the children of Dan being straitened in their Territory under Juda invaded and mastered, and gave it the name of their owne Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Genesis the fourteenth, at which place Abraham surprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as farres as Sobah, formerly remembred in the diuision of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the ioynt name of Lechem-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneua Lajsch, Iosephus, Dana; Beniamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witness Nubrigenis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brocard the Monke, and Pestellus: who also raketh this City to be the fame, which in Matthew the 15. verse 39. in the Euangel is called Magedina, for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place, and in Saint Marke speaking of the same flory, Dalmathia. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free City, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subiect unto the Kings thereof, for it is written in the eighteenth of Judges, And there was none to help, because Lais was as farre from Zidon: and they had no businesse with other men, for it was aboute thirty English miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times when these Regions became subiect to the State of Rome, it had the Plin. l. 5. c. 15.
 50 name of Pancon, from a Fountaine adjoining to called: and therefore Ptoleme calles it Cafarea Pania. Hegeffippus calles it Parnium faith Wesselingb: but he had read it in a cor- Hege. l. 4. c. 35.
 rupt copy: for in Hegeffippus let out by Badius, it is written Pancum without an (R): and at such times as Philip the sonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Gouvernour of Traconitis, sometime Bafan, this City was by him amplified and for- For of another tified; and both to give memory to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Cafar, he called Cafaria (or C it Cafarea Philippi: and it so became the Metropolis, and head City of Traconitis: and only Cafaria (or C of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly Cafaria (or C adorned: by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as for Caesarea Plin. l. 5. c. 15.
 the former of these Cities, it was the same with Antioch.

a tefephim in the book of the Iewish war 18. faith that Philop the Tetrarch cast chaffe into a fountain called Phals, it stant 120. f. di North-east from Cafarea, which chaffe being carried under ground was cut up. It was called up to gaine at Pain or Dan, whereby it is conjectured that the first Spring Jordan is to this fountain called Phals from whence Jor and Dan receive their waters.

nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in Saint Hieromes time the Citizens remembered their former Panthea, and so recalled it, with the Terrour adorning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ became of a bloody issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith:
who afterward, as these was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods goodness; and no lesse grateful for the same, as Eusebius and Nicophorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as mere as it could be moulded: the other made like her selfe, kneeling at his feete, and holding vp her hands towards him. These were mounted vpon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same Metall, which shee placed by a Fountaine neere her owne House: both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, euen to his owne time: which himselfe had seene, who lived in the Reigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeere after Christ 363. that Monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast downe, and defaced: searing by the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heauen broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts, lundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Gregory in his fifth booke, and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was neere thei conyng together of those two Riueres which arisling from the springs of Ior and Dan, the two a partant Fountaines of Iordan: in a foyle exceeding fruitful, and pleasaunt, for, as it is written, Judges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the fields belonging to this City it was that Saint Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City receiued the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the fame fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: vnder Fulch the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them againe it was recovered. Lastly, now iremoued with all that part of the World subiect to the Turke.

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

Among the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capharnaum is not the least: so often remembered by the Euangelists. This City had the honour of Christ's preface three yeeres: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the Doctrine of our saluation: according to that notable Prophecy of Ezay 9. The people that walked in darkness, haue seen a great light: they that dwell in the Land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.

death, upon them hath the iudge ligned.

Capharnaum was located on Jordan, even where it entrench into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich soyle: of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophesied in these wordes, And then Capharnaum which art lifted up into heaven, shall be brought downe to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatness of that City: for it was one of the principal Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth: it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Bre- chard Breitenbech and Salinius affirme, that it then consisted but of six poore Fishers houses.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolis or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in Saint Matthew, Mark, and Luke, also remembered, but I find no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Plinius himselfe ¹ conflicts for Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountaine Cafus in Cassia: and endeth it to the South at Aegypt and Arabia; by which description it embraceth Phoenicia, a part of Calabria, all Palatiana, and Judea.

Plinius also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, hee numbred foure of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first the three, Damascus, Ophius, Raphana, then Philadelphus (which was first called Amarna, saith Sepphorus, or as I like Amarna rather, because it was the chiefe City of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbath, before Ptole. Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis (some sometime Nisā, built (as is false) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nhrfe, who died therein, anciently known by the name of Bethshan, for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Calefyria, which was also called Antioch and Selencia;) but itis Gadara in Bafan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, seated on an high hill, neere the River of Hieromaix.

 This River Ortelius takes to be the River Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manasse ouer Jordan: but he mistaketh it, for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betwene Hippus and Gerafa, whereas Iaboc runneth the same Sea betwene Ephron and Phanuel. For the seventh he nameth * Hippus, or Hippion, a City so called of a Colonie of Horsemen there garrisoned by Herod, on the East-side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasse ouer Jordan. For the eighth Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated, in the South border of the Region ouer Jordan, called Perea. For the ninth Gelasa, which Iosephus takes to be Gerafa: and Gerafa is found in Calefryia by Iosephus, Hegelippus, and Stephanus; but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phoenicia. The tenth and last, Plinie nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Plolateran calles Gama, but Hegelippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Bafan ouer Jordan, so called, because those two Hillies on which it is seated, haue the shape of a Camell. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Bruchard, Freidenbach, and Salguinae, which makes them to be these; Cesarea Philippi, and Afor, before remembred, Cedes Nephthaim, Sepher, Corazin, Capharnaum, Bethsaida, Isotapata, Ti-0 berias, and Scythopolis, or Bethshan. For all other Authours disfigure herein, and give no reason for their opinion. One place of the Euangelist Saint Matthew makes it manifest that this Region called Decapolis, was all that Tract betwene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coasts of Tyrrus and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Daniscus and Libanus on the North: by the Phenician Sea, betwene Zidon and Ptolomus on the West: by the Hillies of Gelbo and Bethshan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracanes, otherwise Hermion, Sanir, and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neere the same distance which may be each way forty English miles.

Of Hamath.

B^V to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is seated nere the foote thereof the City of * Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adjoining tak-eth name: the same which Iosephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: a Iacobus of Isurais, faith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephthali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachone.

 But herein following Strabo, who calles Tracomonitis Isurais, he mistakes the seate of this Region : and so doth Mercator. For indeede were Isurais (which Heg- sippus calles Perraz, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the same with Tracomonitis, yet Tracomonitis is selfe is farr more to the East than Hammath in Nephthaim: for Tracomonitis lieth betwene Cas- sarea Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones: which the Hebrewes call Gilead: and this Hammath or Chammath is seated vnder Cassarea, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Celestria beyond the Mountaines Trachones, which ^b Hierome vpon Amos calles Antiochia, with ^c Hammath or Hamath the lesser in Phenicia; and Nephthaim, which he calleth Epphanias for this Hammath originer Translation Emath (and nor that which is commonly called there is mention of Hamath the great, as it seems, for distinction from the other in Nephtholim, though Matf. Berodah reciting Hamath, rather follows the opinion of Zeiger above mentioned, as indeed it cannot easily be justified, that either one or other of these is either Autioch or Epiphania, howbeit that the same Cyrrus which Isaiah 19. 55. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephtholim, was also called Chammath (whence the word Hamath & Emath, were framed) it may be gathered partly because the other Hamath, a *Clavi. streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another streame Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Cibion where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Cadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorfeus: though others distinguish them, and let Chorfeus be Casaria Palestina. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethania, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a riuer rising out of the fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum, which Torrent they call Dothan, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephtasael, which Iefua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

HHe next adioyning Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Issachar, who inhabited a part of the neather Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered to the holy Land, 64300.

the first Citee of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Thersis eight English mile, or somewhat more; a Citee wherein the Jewes (by the practice of a certaine mutinous upstart, John the sonne of Cena) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Gouvernour of both Galilees. This Citee was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian, who entered it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Jewes in a sea-fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee; he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: fauouring that his furie being quenched with the riuers of blood running through euery street, he referred the remainder to flaues and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cefston, or Cifhion, of the Leuites; and then Isachar, remembered in the first of Kings c. v. 17, then Abes or Ebes, Jof. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Jo. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Jof. 21. 29. this allo was a City of the Leuites, from whom Territorye the Mountaines of Gilboa take beginning; and range themselves to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezrel, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethphesi, or Bethpaffes, according to Zegler, and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, nere which Saul slew himselfe: vndertho, Aphes or Aphes, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: between which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, & afterward against Saul: a Land thirthe of blood, for herein allo, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Regals afflicting Benhadad, incurred Achub: were ouerthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorabile answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness boast himselfe, as he that putteth it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. In the yeere following, in the fields, as they lay, adioyning to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian vterly broken and discomfited by Acab: and 100000. footmen of the Arames or Syrians slaine: before which ouerthrow the seruants and Counsaillors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountains: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines, they should ouercome them.

Under Aphee towards the Seathery feith the Citie of Efdrelon, in the plaines of Gulles, called also the great field of Efdrelon, and Magedo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Apheo befeene, faith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After theſe are the Cities of Cafalath, of which, 1. Machab. 9.2: Asem or Hen-Gannim of the Lenites, and Seffims or Shahafims, the Weſt border of Iſſachar, of which Iof. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Seacoaſt, there is found the Caſtle of Pilgrimes: a ſtrong Caſtle inuironed with the Sea, ſometime the flore-houſe and Magazine of the Chriſtians, and built by the Earle of S^t. Giles or Tolome.

From the Castle of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermost farthestmost thore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the River Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make trial whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar : which done, the Priests of Baal prayed; and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuite of his enemies : or lay-sure, or perchance asleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessells of water thereon : by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifon adjoyning.

At the foot of this Mountain to the North stand Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also known by the name of Porjina and Porphyria, sometimes a Suffragane Bishops seat. Returning again from the Seacoast towards Tiberi is the banks of Chifon; there are found the City of Hapharaim or Apharaim, and the Castles of Mezri, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chifon: a beautiful City while it stood, in the Gates whereof Chif raised from death the widows only sonne.

Then Seon or Shion named Iaf. 19. between the two Hills of Hermion, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchauntresse that vnderooke to raise the body of Samuel, at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anaharath and Rabbith named Iof. c. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Dabara is named, Iof. 2. i. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1. Chron. 6. 72. This Citie (which thenceforth is fofe ouer Chifon) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Daberath is Arbela situate, neere the Caues of those two Theues which greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It ioyneth on one side to the Mountain of Jachar or Herman, and on the other to the Valley of Yezrael; which valley continueth in Belshan or Scythopolis, the East border of Yachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboa on the South, and by Herman and the Riuer Chislon on the North. In these plains Gedeon ouerthrew the Amorites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrin, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

6. VII.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

THe next Tribe which ioyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasse was the first begotten of Joseph, the eleventh sonne of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasse with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbered amongst the sonnes of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarkes.

Of Manasse there were increafed in Aegypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men : all which being confumed in the Defarts, there entred of their iflues, 52700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one half of Manaffe, was bound ed by Iordan on the Eaft, and Dora vpon the Mediterran Sea on the Weft, Iefrael on the North, and Macchata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which flood in this Territorie was Bethſan, ſometime Niſa, faith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurſe there buried, of the ſame name; which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the ſeythians invaded Aſia the leſſe, and pierſt into the South, to the vttermoſt of Caſoſyria, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of ſcythians given by the Greekes.

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Jewes to fight against their owne Nation

6. II.
Of the Kings of Tyre.

But whatsoeuer remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the bookes of Zeno, Sachomias, Manfœ, and others of that Nation, being no where found) of the same is to bee gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor liued at once with Iosaph, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Chetians besieged Troy, Phœnix gouerned Phœnicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Iehoiakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremies speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, & Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirme, Xerxes fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Perfians: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiects to Zinobodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembered, Hieremie prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembered by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependance vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Grecians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were contained 130. yeeres and somewhat more between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more vnrworthy of restitution, because (saith Curcius) he rather submitted himselfe by the instigation of his Subiects (who foresaw their vtter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Athenus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill liuing: and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women dancers, and fingers: whom hee to this end chiefly inured, and assembled: that hauing beheld the most beautifull and ludy among them, he might recouer them for his owne vse and delights. Of this strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Therome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Perfians were near him with an Armie too waightly for his strength, & finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done, shee also therewith pierced her owne bodie, and died.

After Alexander was posselt of Zidon, and the other Strato driuen thence, He gaue the Kingdome to Hephæstion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith, and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curcius calls Abdolominus, Iustine Abdolominus, and Plutarch Alynomus: who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting heards and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wife man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subiected to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliueered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is saide, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians, but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesus, doe in no sort agree in the times of their reignes; nor in other particulars.

Abibalus was the first King of the Tyrians, that Iosephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abeybalus: the same perchance: that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourth and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Sidon succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus, David (saith Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Sidon to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psal. 83.

Hiram succeeded Sidon, whom Iosephus calls Iram, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometime Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and sent him Cedars with Mafons and Carpenters, to performe his building in Hierusalem: after he had beaten thence the Iebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of mony, but also he ioyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Nauigators: & lost him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not only mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 3. booke, in Tatians his Oration against the Grecques: and in Zonaras Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, hee despised the 20. Townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King David: & gaue his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Asteroth, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres.

Baleastarus whom Theoph. Antiochenus, calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeeres according to Iosephus.

Abdastarus the eldest sonne of Baleastarus, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 20. yeeres according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus hee reigned 12. yeeres, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurf, the eldest of them held the Kingdome 12. yeeres.

Aflarius brother to Abdastarus, recouered the Kingdome from this Vsurper, and reigned 12. yeeres.

Aflarius, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Aflarius, and ruled 9. yeeres, and liued in all 54.

Phelles the fourth sonne of Baleastarus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Aflarius, and reigned 8. moneths; liued 50. yeeres.

Ithobalus (or Iutobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Aflarius, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddess Astarte, which was a dignity next vnto the King, recouered the death of his father, and slaughtered his Vnckle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeeres, to the same which in the first Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Iezabel, A. Theoph. 12. chab married.

Budezor or Bazor the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45.

Metimus succeeded Budezor, & reigned but 9. yeeres (saith Iosephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Metimus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56. In the seventh yeere of whose reigne, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. yeeres and 8. moneths, after the Temple of Salomon: which by our accompt was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion couetous of Sichens his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traitorously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleue Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: wherupon Elisa fearing to be deposed of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as afore said: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barca in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hanniball. Seruius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts, others from Iudidia, a surname of Salomon.

Elulens

Elulus succeeded Pygmalion : and reigned 36. yeeres : the same that ouerthrew the fleet of Salmanassar, in the Port of Tyre : notwithstanding which, he continued his siege before it on the Land side five yeeres, but in vaine.

After Elulus, Ethobalus gouerned the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to be as wise as Daniel : and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at Iugein his 28. Chapter : out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was slain in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor : who furrounded and attempted Tyre, 13. yeeres together, ere he prevailed.

But followed Ethobalus, and reigned 10. yeeres a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor : for after his death, it was gouerned by diuers Iudges, succeeding each other : First, by Ecnabulus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Gerasus, who held it among them some 7. yeeres, and odd months : after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeere : after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4. yeeres : after him from thence also, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whose reigne Cyrus beganne to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozeus his conceit, that the Edumaeans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

For the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozeus that hath written a Treatise at large, intituled de rebus Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who onely is vchangeable, and the same for euer ; yet whereas the sayde Bozeus, informing here-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians, were fruites of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumaeans, descended from Esau, Iacobs brother : first, it can hardly be deuised that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the prooff which the Scriptures giue of Hirams good affection when Salomon built the Temple) hee brings many coniectural arguments ; whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent : it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esau received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumaeans, he endeouours to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight : partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, & others witness, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrrus, Aradus, and Sidon : which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumaeans : as Elab and Esiogaber, or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose cheefe City was Madian, so called of Midian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it : the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites, differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Heerunto he addes, that Cadmus and his Companions brought nor into Greece the worship of Astarte, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the idolatrous customs of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumaeans, was an Vniuersity, wherein as may appeare by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozeus, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by another, deserues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumaeans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People : neither is it true that they were Edumaeans at all. In what Religion Esau brought vp his children, it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posterity were Idolaters, is directly proued in the 25. Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetuall enemies to the House of Israel, saue onely when Dauid & some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knowes not ? or who is ignorant of Dauid his vnfriendly behauiour amongst them, when first they were subdued : Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betwene Tyrrus & Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid : euen then when Iob flew all the names of Edom : neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edumites were so ill intreated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisdom of Eliphas the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumaeans punished, for being such as Dauid in his owne dayes found them. Although indeede the City of Teman whence Eliphas came to reason with Iob, is not that in Edumaea, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hu, the Country of Iob : and to the City of Bildad the Suhite, as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Iob is said to haue exceeded in riches ; and Salomon in wisdom, all the people of the East ; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eliphas the sonne of Esiu had a sonne called Teman : but that Fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a son called Ismaelites : of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the East had the name : for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, & all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that wel considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue battaile to the Host of Israel, wherein were 60000. able men, will hardly beleue that such a people were descended from one of Esiu his grand-children. For how powerful and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom haue bene : if one Tribe of them, yea one Family of a Tribe had bene : so great : surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec : or assisted the Amalekites : when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom : but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtles was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seignory of the Red-sea coast, which Bozeus imagines the Edumaeans to haue held : if the Edumites in after-times held some places as Elan and Esiogaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himselfe saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom : within which limits had Midian stood, Ismael must needs haue known it : because he had sojourned long in that Country : and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Aegypt.

But coniectural Arguments, how probable soeuer, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psalm, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations : yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozeus himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue bene destroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Aser, Ios. 12. 29. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seede of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed bee God that hath sent King Dauid a wise sonne : we cannot inferre that he was of Dauid s Religion. The Turke hath sayde as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Astarte, and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, he did it for his owne ends, receiving therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly consider things, it will appeare that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon, He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-pestered : being otherwise apt to yelde filkes : as the Andarine filkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oyle, which he wanted, he gaue that which he could well spare to Salomon. Also Gold for Land : wherein Salomon was the wiser, who hauing got the gold first gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that he had : with which the Tyrran was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which enforced Tyrrus to hold league with Israel. For Dauid had subdued Mozab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates : through which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, to their fleets on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyrrus : so that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to passe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, & perhaps haue brought them euen into subiection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ayded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofes which Bozins frames negatively vpon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think no man knows. It seems to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecrades are but single examples. Euerie salvage Nation hath some wisdom: excelleth the Vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good imitation of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Cadmus, Pitca, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colones of the Tyrians (of which I thinke, the Head before men found in the Red Sea to haue bene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This then Idolatry from Salomon time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozins, who would haue vnderstandeth to haue bene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Education. In which fanaticke is so peremptory, that he styeth men of contrary opinion, impugnantes, as if they were impy to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not known his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozins would better haue agreed with Iulian the Apostate, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greekes, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerer vnto the true Religion: what may be saide of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon euerie new victory? How few great battailes did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honor to one of their old Gods: yea, what one Nation, eue only that of the Iewes, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertaine in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Iewes, they reiect, vbraiding the Iewes with him, as if he were unworthy of the Romane Maiesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion, which Heathen writers vsed against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the Ciue of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought, for prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozins, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indifferency is usually found among men of his humour; who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainly fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimeras of Diuinity, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperance ignorance. Great pitty is it, that such mad dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Auing now past ouer Phanicia, wee come to the next Territorie adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excessum for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose yllnes when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Deserts, (Isa excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to be able men 32500. who fate downe on the West side of Jordan, betwene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Anuris or Omri King thereof, and seated on the toppe of the Mountaine Somron, which ouer-looketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Seacoast. It was afterward called Sebastie, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cesar. This City is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building, for as Brocard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brocard found greater then those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other heuie and carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble. It was beare to the ground by the sonnes of Iheronimus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebastie. Herein were the Prophets Heliseus, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cortages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Nere Samaria toward the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine, Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napolsa: It was destroyed by Simcon and Leui, in reuenge of the rauishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec euened with the soyle. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Danians a third time cast it downe.

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhathon on the Mountaine Amalec, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Nere to this Citie Iudas Machabeus our-threw Seron and Lysias, Licutenants to Antiochus. This City had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Ios. 10. And Saron whose King was slaine by Iosua: it is also mentioned A. 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cesarea Palestine, extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Toppe, saith Adrichome. Though indeed the name Saron is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euerie fruitfull plaine Region: for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, betwene Cesarea and Toppe, but that also betwene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Ab. 11. read Saron for Asaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine nere Lidda: which Lidda in this time was called Diopolis, or the City of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudaea, the first in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where Saint Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) culled Aneas. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Toppe Sarena. This Toppe was Jerusalem, he encountered the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that hee was by God destined to be King of Israel: and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Oschores, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Idumean, when he was carried yong into Egypt from the furie of David, and his Captaine Joab; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wiues sister Taphnes; vning both him and Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Juda; that himselfe might the easier spoile it, as he did: for in the time of Rehoboam, Shishak sackt the Citie of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Salomon, and all the spoiles which David tooke from Adadzer of Soba, with the presents of Tobu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouern the Israelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hierusalem to doe their usuall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Beisel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aurons Calfe in Horeb) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seat and Palace at Sichem: Hee despised the warning of the Iudean Prophet, whom Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Isel: his hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatry; and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to route out his posterity.

He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Juda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second yeere of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and rooted out by Baasba, who raigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

Baasba the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Asa King of Juda: hee defeated himselfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nephthaim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Asa carried away the Materials, with which Baasba intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twenty yeeres and died.

To Baasba succeeded Eli his sonne, who at a fast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambris after he had raignd two yeeres: and in him the prophetic of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Eli, and assumed the name of a King seauen dayes; But Ambri in reuenge of the Kings Murder, set vpon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and forst him to burne himselfe.

Ambri or Hemri succeeded Eli, and transferred the Regall seat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Sheuer, built, and fortified it. This Ambri was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiect to Tabremmon, King of Syria: the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conclude; seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Asa King of Juda, to assaile Baasba King of Israel, the Father of Eli who forewent Ambri. This Ambri raignd twelue yeeres, sixe in Thersa, and sixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

Achab or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not onely vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian.

man: and erected an Altar and a Groue to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the triall of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets: and afterward flyeth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at libertie: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michaeas) reprobeth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then ioyning with Iosaphat in the warre for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slaine as Michaeas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and *Ioa*s: besides seauentie other sonnes by sundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he brui- selfe by a fall: and sent for counsaile to Beelzebub the God of Achazib, Eliab the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and mistaking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captaines, and with each fiftie souldiers to bring Eliab vnto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercie at *Eliab*s hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the king: auowing it to the king that he must then die, which came to passe in the second yeare of his raigne.

Ioram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succeeded: He allured Iosaphat king of Juda, and the king of Edom to assit him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themselves and their Horses, in the Deserts. The Prophet Eliha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are ouerthrowne: their king flyeth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his sonne on the wals as a Sacrifice, whereat the three kings moued with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the king of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to haue bene taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab shewed him ore the wals, threatening, vnlesse the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom brought those of Juda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safety of his sonne: which when the other kings refused to yeeld vnto, & that Moab according to his former threatening had burnt the king of Edoms sonne vpon the rampire, that all the assaillants might discernet, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsooke the party of the other kings: for want of whose assistance the siege was broken vp.

After this the king of Aram sent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leprosie. The answere of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that he doth send to heale a man from his Leprosie? adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrell against him. Eliha hearing thereof, willed the king to send Naaman to him: promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel, and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seauen times in Jordan. Eliha refused the gifts of Naaman. But his seruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spiritual gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon the Magus.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damascus, hauing heard that this Prophet did discouer to the king of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsell, sent a troupe of horse to take Eliha: all whom Eliha strooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaria: Ioram then asked leaue of the Prophet to slay them, Eliha forbade him to harme them: but caused them to be fed and sent back to their own Prince in safety.

The king of Aram notwithstanding these benefits, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreame famine. Ioram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Eliha. Eliha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and armour to sound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege; an act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azrael obtained the kingdom of Syria by the death of his Maister, Ioram entring vpon his frontier, tooke Ramoth Gilead: in which war he receiued diuers wounds, and returned to Iezrael to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Eliha) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Ahab.

Iehu who reigned after Iehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he receiued a promise from God. That his seed should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatry of Ieroboam, for which he was plagued with greuous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazeel the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countreies to the East of Jordan: in which warre hee was slaine, saith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu reigned 28. yeeres.

Ioachaz, or Iehoahaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subiected, leaving him onely 50. horse, 20. che-10 riots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioachaz reigned 17. yeeres.

After Ioachaz Ioas his sonne gouerned Israel, who when hee repaired to Elisba the Prophet as hee lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisba couered the Kings hands with his, and bid him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten five or sixe times, and then he should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as he gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ioas, who ouerthrew the 20 Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his Father Ioachaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amazia King of Juda, who provoked him to make the warre, whereupon he entred Hiernusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ioas reigned sixteene yeeres and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisba exchanged this life for a better.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioas his father, an Idolater as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is nere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift & last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one month, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menahem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of siluer, which hee exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menahem gouerned twenty yeeres.

Pekahiah or Phaceia, or after Zonaras Phaceia, succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, he was slaine by Phaca or Pekah the Commander of his army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekahs time, Phulassar or Tiglar-Phylassar invaded the kingdom of Israel, and wan Nion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Ianosch, Kedesh, Hifor, and Gilead, with all the Cit-40 ties of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Assyria: he was drawne in by Achab king of Judea against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achab being wasted by Pekah of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, & therewith ingaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed the Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inuading of the great Assyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Judea. Pekah reigned twenty yeeres.

Then Hofea or Ofsa, who slew Pekah, became the vassal of Salmannassar; but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicus king of Egypt: which being knowne to the Assyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Niniue in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Easterne Regions, and there disperfed them: and replanted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cutha (inhabiting about Cutha a fluer in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Sepharuajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunted) also with those of Aua, which were of the ancient Antini, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling nere vnto Gaza, whom the Captiues rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desert, called Hauai, willing to returne to their ancient seats. To these he added those of Chamath or or Ituraa, the ancient enemies of the Israelites. and sometime the Vassalls of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian aduise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Iudaea, and Hiernusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driuen thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, hapned in the yeare of the world 3292. the sixth yeare of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hofea the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other halfe of Manasse.

§. 1.

Of Dan, whereof Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

50

Now following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which family there were numbered at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their sons 17. 46. 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Ioppe, or Iapha, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hiernusalem. From hence Jonas imarked himselfe when he fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Macchabeus gouerned the Jewes, the Syrians that were Garrisoned in Ioppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

It

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lieutenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeere of Christ, 1250. Lodouick the French King gave it new Wall and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Iaffa. There are certaine Rockes in that Port, wherunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chaines: & from thence deliuered from the Sea-Monster by Perseus. This Fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Iosephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scaurus during his office of A dileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome vpon Ionas speaks of it indifferently.

The next vnto Ioppe was Iamnia, where Judas Macchabeus burnt the rest of the Syr. In the fire and flame whereof was seene at Hierusalem 240. furlongs off. It had 10 sometime a Bishops seate, saith Will. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time, that fuch a place there was.

After Iamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthon, saith Volaterran. And so Montanus seemes to vnderstand it. For he sets it next to Aegypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anthon. But Volaterran giues neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Protonius sets Anthon farre to the South of Ioppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixtenc miles from Ioppe; where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Iofua could not expell, nor the Danites after to him: nor any of the Israellites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, his Captaine; did diuers others, not much inferiour in strength and stature vnto Goliath.

Roboam the Sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazias destroyed it againe. It was also laid waste by Azad King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Cattle in the same place out of the olde ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the holy Warre calls Ibistin, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Anthon.

Not farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsames, or the house of the Sanne. In the fields adioyning to this City (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two King, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsames presuming to looke there, 30 in, there were slain of the Elders 70, and of the people 50000. by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter & the great lamentation of the people: it was called the great Abel, saith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other Cities of this name: one in Nephtalim; another in Juda; and another in Isachar. Hiero ne finds a fifth in Beniamin.

Keeping the Sea-Coast, the strong City of Accaron offrech it selfe, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Casaria Palestine. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it selfe against the Canites & Indeans. It worshipped Beelzebub the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Abaziah King of Israel, sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Elisha meeting by the way, caused them to returne, with a for-⁴⁰ towfull answer to their Master. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

Christianus Schroz placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekyra. This Azotus or Afod was also an habitation of the Anakims, whom Iofua failed to destroy, though he once possit their Citie. Heerein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the ark of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Neere it was that famous Judas Macchabeus slain by Bacchor 29. yeeres Chides and Alcinus, the Lieutenants of Domevius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathas: together with the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neere which also hee ouerthrew ⁵⁰ Apollonius.

Gabinus the Romane re-built it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in S. Hieromes time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountaine of Ethiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Iforah, or Sarata, and Esthaol, and between them Casra Dan; neere Hebron: though this place where Sampson was borne, may seeme by the words, Iud. 13. 12. to bee in the Tribe of Judah, as the other also were bordering Townes betwene Dan and Juda.

After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1. Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebeus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Jewes, and neere which himselfe was by the Macchabees ouerthrowne.

Then Modin the Native Citie of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulcher the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that height, as they seemed for a mark to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeeres after their first setting vp, as Brachard and Breidenbach witness.

There are besides these the Citie of Cariathiarim, that is, the Citie of the woods: seated in the border of Juda, Beniamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twenty yeeres in the house of Aminadab: till such time as Dauid carried it thence to Hierusalem: 1. Sam. 7. 2. Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the sonne of Barachias, or Ichaida, who was slain betweene the Temple and the Altar: also Vrias whom Iachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered as we finde in Jeremie. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather as I take it vpon presumption than warrant, I omitte: as that of Caspin taken with great slaughter by Judas Macchabeus: and Lachis, whose King was slain by Iofua, in which also Amazias was slain: The same which Senacherib tooke, Ezekias reigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Iofua C. 19. from the Verse 41. where also it is added that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Lechem, and inhabited it: which City after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Casarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituraa, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this Citie see more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountaines of fame.

It hath two Riuer or Torrents: the Norther-moist feth out of the Mountaines of Juda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek or Sored, whose banks are plentifull of Vines which haue no feedes or stoness: The wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, taste, and fauour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the Riuer, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loured.

§. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

The Tribe of Simeon takes vp the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Aegypt: who being the second Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were increased of that Familie while they abode in Aegypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their liues in the Desarts, there entered the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing armes, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part seuered, inhabiting a finall Territorie on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumeda, of which the first Citie adioyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Reguli or pettie Kings thereof were called Ascalonites: of which Volaterran out of Xanthis, in the Historie of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymeneus: and that Ascalus being employed by Acimius King of the Lydians, with an Armie in Syria, falling in loue with a young Woman of that Countrie, built this Citie, and called it after his owne name: the same hath Nicolaus in his Historie, saith Volaterran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third booke remembreth a Lake neere Ascalon, wherein there hath bene a Temple dedicated to Dercete, the Goddesse of the Syrians; hauing the face of a Woman, and the bodie of a Fish: who, as I haue said before, in the storie of Ninur, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be cast into this Lake, and fedde and releued by Doues. And therefore was the Doue worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palaestina sancta Columba Syro.

The white Doue is for holy held, in Syria Palestine.

It was one of the chiefeft and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men men (saith Polaterran) as Antiochus, Sofus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the storie of Bislymia.

Vol. VI. p. 104.

In Afcalon, as some say, was that wicked Hered borne, that seeking after our Sauour, caused all the Male-children of two yeeres olde and vnder to be slaine. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the Holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many buildings. Eius muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instaurauit, saith Adrichomius.

In Dauids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for hee named Gath and Afcalon only, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Iomathan: as he is speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streetes of Afcalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinus restored it as he did Azonus and Gaza.

Next to Afcalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrians Azan: of Azonus (as they say) the fonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirm, that it was built by Iupiter. Pomp. Met. giues the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike hee re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proued by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Perfia, he receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, & was called Gaza of the Desart.

Alexander Imneus King of the Iewes surprized it, and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo which stood thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set vp in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouerturned, but somewhat neerer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Macchabees; and gaue many wounds to the Iewes till it was foist by Simon: of which hee made so great account, as that hee purposed to ride therein himselfe, and in his absence left Iohn his Sonne and Successor to be Governor. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the Riner of Besor, standeth Maiona the Port of Gaza: to which the principall of a Citie was giuen by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance after the name of the Euphronis Sonne. But Julian the Apostate soone after flourishing the Gazens, made it subiect vnto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima.

On the other side of Besor, standeth Anibedon, defaced by Alexander Imneus, restored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the fauorite of Augustus.

Then Raphia, where Philopater ouerthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torpent of Egypt, till the Septuagint conuerted it Rinocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giuing the name of the Citie to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocolora; and Iosephus, Rhinocorus: * Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was diuided by lot, betwene the three Sonnes of Noah.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuer of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadesh & Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neere to the Wilderness of Beer-shebah, it appeares Gen. 20. 3. and therefore no maruell that as elsewhere Beer-shebah, so sometime Gerar, hee made the South bound of Canaan. It was of olde a distinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; Saint Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio Alutaria; the healthy Countie: so that it was no maruell that Abraham and Isaac liued much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2. Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuer of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sopher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuersitie, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In Saint Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of Dauid: Iofua 15. 49. it is called Vrbs Samma: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbs Arbahi. For euen hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othaniel, encouraged by Caleb's promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Iofua and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprize, it appeares Iof. 10. 39. This Citie Iof. 2. 1. 15. is named among those which out of Simoon and Juda were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it seemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simoon, but of lesse fame, as Hajon, of which Iof. 19. 7. which also Iof. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Juda and Simoon (for which Ianius thinks Hulbam is named 1. Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Iofua these two are distinguished) also Tbolad * And also so named 1. Chron. 4. 39. for which Iofua 19. 4. we haue Eltholad. Chatzar-Sufa so named Iofua 19. 5. for which Iofua 15. we haue Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Sufa Equitatus.

In the same places of Iofua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the same with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simoon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumaea. For Israel fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Desart.

The same places also name Beer-sheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betwene Abraham and Abimelee: neere vnto which Hagar wandred with her Sonne Ismael. It was Gen. 21. 31. also called the Citie of Isaac, because hee dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simoon which are named in the places of Iofua, and of the Chronicles above noted, because they helpe vs nothing in storie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekiel King of Juda, certaine of this Tribe being strengthened in their owne Territories, passed to * Gedor, as it is, 1. Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Iof. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederotaima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they feared themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chieft: vnto which hee carried the Gate-port of Gaza. The Riuers are Besor, and the Torrent of Agyp called Shichar, as is noted in Affer.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF IUDA.

IF Juda the fourth Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Desarts. And of their sonnes there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territorie giuen, called afterward Iudaa: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simoon included. And many Cities named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong vnto the Children of Juda: who had a kinde of Soueraigntie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Beth-femes, Tsiglak, Beer-sheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Prouince (if it be meated by that ground giuen to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the wincesse of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbred the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chieftest of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Iudaa from Idumaea: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and took from them some spoyles, and many prisoners: who being afterward ouerthrowen by the Israelites, the sonnes of Kemi, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumaea and the South, Ascensus Scorpionis, or Acrab: him is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to bee in that the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Lida, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neere Taphnia, and thence part Iuda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron: at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham, which S. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree; and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the yonger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achide, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the olde Castle, erected by Ionathas Macchabeus, and called Massada, garnished it with 27. high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men; being as it seemeth a place vnaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltite, this Countie had foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrah, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their vnaturall finnes.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF REUBEN
and his Borderers.

†. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanne from Schon King of Hesbon.

IN the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sonnes inhabited; of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who tlying with the rest in the Deserts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before we speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we care to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israhel, and afterward Iewes: by Esaue or Edom the Edumians: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possit by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them descended) these illues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Agypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Esaue and his sonnes held Edumes, which bounded Canaan on the South. Ismael tooke from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desert, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sur to Hanilah.

Moab tooke the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plains betwene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as farre North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon late dworne on the North-east side of Arnon, and possit the Tract from Rabbah afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilhead, and without them as farre forth as Arroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border betwene the Riuer of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possit by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedor-lobomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzummim or Zurra, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedor-lobomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Arnon or his Ancestor beaten beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countries, betwene Abarim and Jordan, and driuent them from Hesbon ouer Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arrivall upon that border, when Fabel gouerned the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Fabel, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were electiue, as the Edumians anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab betwene Arnon and Jordan, as farre North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israhel arrivd there out of Agypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Iephthah the Iudge of Israhel iustly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claime of the Ammonites: to becaue (as he alleadged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Iephthah) had 300. yeeres time to recouer them, and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And lest any should maruell why the Ammonites in Iephthahs time should make claime to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Numb. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to haue bene the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the yron bed of Og was to be seene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israhelites possit, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sebons was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seate so confusedly together that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, & Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Iephthahs time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soueraigntie: and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Arroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking aduantage of the time, they then sought to recouer it againe. Yet at such time as Moses ouerthrew Sehon at Iabac, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Arroer, and betwene it and Iabac: Sehon and Og two Kings of the Amorites hauing displaced both Moab and Ammon 30. all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. 21. 24. that Israhel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iabac, euen vnto the children of Ammon, so as at this time the Riuer of Iaboc was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions ouer Iaboc, which at length the Gadites possit, as in the the 13. chapter of Iosua, vers. 25: it appeares.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Pulger, without any shew of warrant, readeth Iethon. The Pulger or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two verses 36. and 37. in 21. Ios. being wanting in the olde Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slip into Iethon.

This Citie which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Desert adioyning; from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Iosua where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Pulger for Besler or villa eius, reads Beser in Saladine Misfor. Kedmoth is amonged from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Towne called Misfor, in the border betwene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth neere the Dead Sea (for the Countie betwene being Mountainous hath few Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lafa or Leshah, of which Genes 10. verse 19. The Greekes call it Cal-lirhoe: neere which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water: all which soone after their rising, being ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contraction of sinewes: to which Herod the elder, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired: but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macherus in this Tribe. The like fountaines are found in the Pyrenies: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Incas or Kings. The other towne is Macherus, the next betwene Lafa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land Citie and Castle, standing vpon a Mountaine euery way vnacceffible. It was first fortified by Alexander Iannæus, who made it a frontier againt the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinus, in the war with Aristobolus, faith Iosephus. It was thither (faith Iosephus) that Herod sent Iohn Baptist, and where in hee was flaine: his armie soon after being vterly ouerthrowne by Aretas King of Arabia, and himfelfe after this murder neuer prospering. Not farre from Macharus was Bozor or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and nere it Linias vpon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Linia the mother of Tiberius Cæfar.

To the North of Linias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israell embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi, with his speare, bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the midst of their sinne: and from hence Iofua lent the Discouersers to view Ierico, staying here vntill hee went ouer Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreames of, reading Ios. 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius scallum Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the iust being placed, grow as the Cedars, Psal. 92. 13.

The plaine Country herabout, by Moses called The Plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomie to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desert of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the East it had Chaseroth, & Dizahab (of which two the former is that Gazorum, of which Ptolomie in Palestina, the later was Traci be- longing to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petraea, where was Mezahab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medaus and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deuter. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Linias, of which euen now wee spake.

Allo on the same North side towards the confines of Calefryia, it had Theophel: where also on sometime Pella of Calefryia stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus faith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be once againt for necre vnto Suph, for which the vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Numb. 2. 14. it is translated the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, with the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph or Suphah: which doubtlesse was about these Plaines of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Countrey being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as also the dead Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plains of Moab, where Moses made those diuine exhortations, some say was Etchabara where Iohn baptized, which in the storie of Gedeon is called Beth-bara. Iosephus saies it was where after the Citie Abila stood, necre Jordan, in a place set with Palm trees: which fure was the same as Abel-sittim in the Plaines of Moab, Numb. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-sathaim and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim; which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these plains of Moab, they placeth the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sihma and Hesbon the chiefe Citie of Sehon, and Elhabel, and Kiriathaim the feat of the Giant Emim. Of the two first of these Moab seemes to giue a note that the names were to be changed: because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatrie. For Nebo (in stead of which Iunius, Ef. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebo in these parts so denominat: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgab, Montem before his death saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which storie Iunius doth not take Phasgab or Pisgab, for any proper name: but for an appellative, signifying a Hill: and so also Parabulus in some places, as Numb. 21. 20. where hee north that some call Pisgab that top which looketh to Iericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Ios. 13. 20. called Abdoth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisga: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Pisga. In the same place of Iofua there is also named Beth-peor, as belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idoll was called Baal-peor, which they say was the same as Priapus: the chiefe place of whose worship seemes to haue bene Bamoth-Bahal, of which also Ios. 13. in the Citie of Reuben: for which Numb. 22. 41. they read the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

†. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

There were besides these diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gauchis Daughter Michal from Dauid: but Iunius thinkes this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering much out of Efay 10. vers. 29. where it is named among the Citie of Beniamin. With better reason perhaps out of Numb. 21. v. 19. wee may say that Mathana and Nahaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the rest of the Citie of Moab.

Midian also is found in these parts, the chiefe Citie of the Midianites in Moab: but not that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Uthro inhabited. For of the Midianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and receiued an exceeding ouerthrow by a Regiment of twelue thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the plains of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompanie their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer were then flaine: and their Regall Citie with the rest destroyed. The other Midianites ouer whom Iethro was Prince, or Priest, forgat not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but relieued & assisted the Israelites in their painfull trauals, through the Deserts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chiefe Citie of Edom, there is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was also called Ishtael, as appeares by the place 2. Reg. 14. It was built (faith Iosephus) by Lib. 4. Ant. 24. Rekem, one of those five Kings of the Midianites flaine as before is said: after whom it was called Rekem: Now they say it is called Crac and Mozera. The Soldans of Aegypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Aegypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest Citie: the same perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Nabatha, whence also the Prouince adioyning tooke name: which name seemes to haue been taken at first from Nabath the sonne of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabatha is no where vnderstood for all Arabia Petraea, (at least where it is not mis-understood) but it is that Prouince which neighboureth Iudea. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomie calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Midianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Bisan, were parts of Arabia Petraea: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth calls Hagarims of Hagar.

This Citie Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Roman Armie, & finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of money, & to quit it. Yet Amasias king of Iuda (after he had slaughtered 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) was also this Citie. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabit to be naturall of this Citie. In the meane time when the Christians held the Kingdome of Iherusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, hauing before beene vnder the Greeke Church. It is feared not far from Hor where Aaron died, & on the other side towards the North is the ruiner of Zared or Zered, by which Moses incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichome describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and betwene Zared and Arnon: and to hee doth the Valley of Saua: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra: (for which it comes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Saua also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, & vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Affyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Saua, or Sauah, which is the Kings Dale, where Abraham set vp his Monument, as it seemes, not farre from Iherusalem. And at the same time Melchizedec King of Salem also also incountred him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either neere Hebisan otherwise Seythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not incountre each other in Araba: and therefore Saua, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

†. IIII.
Of the Dead Sea.

NOW because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was fresh water) also the Sea of the Wildernesse, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this storie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthning. The length of this Lake Iosephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which makes 18. of our miles and somewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale lesse. But those that haue of late yeres scene this Sea, did account it (saith a Weissenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirte of ours in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, speciei maris, sapore corruptior, grauitate odoris accolis pestifer: neq. vento impellitur, neq. pisces aut suetus aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde superiecta et solida feruntur, perit imperitij, nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borders. It is neither moved nor raised by the winde: nor indureth fish to live in it, or fowle to swimme in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the vnskillfull of swimming, as well as the skillfull, are borne vpon by this water. At one time of the yere it catcheth vpon Bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is vled in the trimming of ships, and the like busineses.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: "The fields not farre from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful and adorned with great Cities were burnt with lightning; of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a sad face, as hauing lost her fruitfullnesse; for whatsoever doth either grow or is set thereon, be it fruits or herbs, when they come to ripenesse, haue nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus saith Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, doe looke faire, and are of good colour on the out-side, but being cut haue nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake catcheth vpon, it was by the Greekes called Asphaltis, respasian chironus to be fastified of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certaine Captiues to be cast into it, who were not onely vnskillfull in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, and notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sinke.

†. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben posselt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Country (within Arnon) Reuben posselt (though not taken from Moab but fro Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Iunius in the 21. of Numbers, vers. 14. nameth Shaleh, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balaac, the son of Zippor: which Balaac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hechoped by the helpe of Balaams cursings or enchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases; And though Balaam at the first, moued by the spirit of God, blest Israel contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to doe him seruice, he aduised Moab to send Madianitish Women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatrie of the Heathen: but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his cuill counsaile, and was slaine among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: sauing that wee finde in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Iosib, and Sareph, Sareph, all being of the illie of Iuda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hac prius fuerit, these Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their posterity chule rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Egion King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them eightene yeres: which Egion, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom Dauid fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he receiued Dauid, and releued him; knowing that Saul fought his life.

After this, Dauid himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for hee slaughtered two parts of the people; and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was said of Dauid, Moab is my wash-pot, ouer Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that hee would reduce them to such an abiection, and appoint them for base seruices: And that hee would tread downe the Idumaeans.

The next King after Dauids time, of the Moabites, whose name liueth, was Mesha: who falling from Iuda, (perhaps in remembrance of the feuerie of Dauid) fastened himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, with the wooll: who revolted againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was inuaded by Iehoram: with whom ioyned the Kings of Iuda & Idumea: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, hee fledde to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assited by the Ammonites and Idumaeans, inuaded Iehoshaphat: and by reason of some priuate quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set vpon the Idumaeans, and slaughtered them: and then onc against another: so as Iehoshaphat had a notorious victorie over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mesha of Hierem. Moab many decents: for Mesha liued with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedeckias time, fourteene Kings of Iuda conning betwene, who wasted three hundred and odde yeres.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE Territory adioyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which ioyned to the Mountaines, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as farre to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad the seventh son of Isaac by Gen. 30. 40 Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Deserts, 45550. and of their sonnes there entered the Land promised, 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manasse the Riuer of Iaboc diuided them: from Reuben the Cities of Hebron, Elhele, and Aphec.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer: which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Iunius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab harahero, quae est in ripa fluminis Arnon, et Chitite ipsa quae est in flumine; Where the Citie in the River is distinguished from the Citie vpon the bankes of the Riuer, (as also in like manner Ios. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Harahero which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeede seated neere Har of the Moabites, but diuerse from it. For that Har was neuer posselt by Moses, it is plaine Deuteronomie 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith hee hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is said to be within and in the middle of the Riuer of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harahero, which is said in the same places to be on the bankes of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Iunius proueth out of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is said to be diuided into diuers streames, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Ios. 13. 25. where Harahero is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah as it seemes, cannot bee the Rabbah

Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they feare not Harober neere it, nor in fight of it) and therefore by Rabbah here we must vnderstand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harober. And as for Har (which algaue the name to the coast adioyning) it seemes it continued in the possession of the Mosabites after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by the expounding Chedorlomer and his Associates: but Harober by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being wonne from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seemes in the story of Iephtha, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites againe by the Israelites vnder the conduct of Iephtha. In S. Hieromes time the greater part of this Citie perished by an earthquake, as Numb. 32. 34. though Iosua 13. 20 himselfe, in the destruction of Sodom, seated not farre hence: which they say was therefore called Vitula conitermans, because as a wanton tumbling Heifer, she was thence overthrowne with earth-quake: for which cause also Hierome seemes to thinke that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14. 2.) and Salissa which hath a signification of the ternarie number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Brochard takes Harober to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab, adioyning to Edom, whereas Harober is in the North-east border. Betweene Harober and Jordan they feate Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to haue built it, Numb. 32. 34. though Iosua 13. 20 vers. 17. it is said that Moses gaue it to the Reubenites. Of this Citie among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hieremie prophesied, that it should perish: and the Lakes about it runne with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neere Arnon in Saint Hieromes time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay prophesieth. That the waters thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not farre from Bethnimrah in this Tribe Adrichomius placeth Jobeba, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which we reade in the storie of Gedeon: and that Jobeba was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appeares, Numb. 32. 35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certaine: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith hee) went and tooke Kenath with her Townes, and called it Nobach of his owne name, where because the verbes precedent speake of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would haue featured this feate of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, Num. 32. 35. therefore it may seeme that this Nobach was in than part of Manasse, which was in the East of Jordan: though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas hee supposeth it to bee the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speake in the Tribe of Beniamin. And as for that Karkor where Zebach and Salmunah rested themselves in their flight from Gedeon, to which place Gedeon marched through this Naboch and Jobeba, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15. and 2. Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certaine that it was a principall Citie held still by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hataroth-Sophan: for which later the Vulgar maketh two Cities, Roth and Sophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corone.

In the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon, together with Bethnimrah, of which we haue spoken, Iosua. cap. 13. v. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32. 36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimra, is said to haue been builded by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Iosua it is called Beth-Haram,) some take to be Retaramphtha, (of which Iosua after by Herod called Iulias. But whether this Retaramphtha were corrupted from Beth-Haram, or from Beth-Aramathas (of which Aramathas there is mention in Iosua) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idoll of those Countries, we reade, Acts 7. 43. and to which Iunius referres the name of the Citie Rephan, 1. Machab. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Iulius (according to Iosua sometimes Retaramphtha) the same Iosua placeth in the Region of Peraa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Peraa, as the Greeke word signifieth, is no more then Regio vltior, the Countrey beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Peraa, take more paines then needes. Fourteene Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Iosephus. He makes it to haue bene built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias, in honour of the adoption of Linia, Augustus his Wife, into the Indian family: by which adoption she was called Iulia. Ano- Ios. Ant. 18. 2 Iulias, hee saith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida. 2. Bel. Iud. 4. 8

Vpon the Sea of Gahlee neere to Iulias in Peraa, (that is, in the Region ouer Jordan) they finde Petzabrisa, as it is called in Iosephus, for Beth-zabot, which is as much as domus Ios. de Bell. 1. 7. c. 8. Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for safegard in the time of Warre with the Romanes, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged, Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she ate her owne child, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Ios. 13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon) it is plaine by the story of Gedeon that it is neere vnto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuit of Zebach and Salmunah, hee requested reliefe of the men of Succoth; who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideons returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a threshing Carre of Tribulum, betwene which and their flesh he put Thornes to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which sort also Dauid vied some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in halfe, either for Men or Cattell, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Ramesses in Aegypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vied after for forty yeeres in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles was instituted.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named, Ios. 12. 38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaïm, Cheshon, and Iahzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites, of which Iahzer, as Cheshon or Heshon was a chiefe Citie of Sehon, whence Num. 32. 1. his Countrey is called the Land of Iahzer. It was taken by Moses, hauing first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the prophetic of Esay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay also Hieremie in a like prophetic alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Maccabeus: as it is 1. Macc. 5. 8. where Iunius out of Iosephus reades Iahzer though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Iosua 16. 3. & 8. and Iud. 1. 29.) was farre from these Countreys of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salmunus time, for whom the King of Aegypt wan it from the Canaanites, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Cheshon it may be maruelled that in the place of Iosua, and 1. Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to haue bene giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13. v. 17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Cashon, 1. Macc. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Iudas Maccabeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Cashon had bene the Cheshon of Gad: and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betwene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites, for so also it seemes that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaïm, which word signifieth a double Armie, we reade Gen. 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Hoste or company, to ioyne with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. we reade of a multitude of the Hoste of Heauen, which appeared to the sheepe-herds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so vnto the Godly King Ofwald of Northumberland, when hee was soone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of midle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the Bataille was fought in the North-parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this Citie of Machanaim David abode during the rebellion of Abisalom: and the same for the strength thereof. Abner chose for the seat of Abisalom, during the warre betweene David and the house of Saul.

Battaile

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilead, we read often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which King Achab lost his life. Iunius thinks that Ramatha-Mispe, of which Iosias 13.26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heape, because of the heape of Stones which Laban and his sonnes left for a monument; so also that it was called Mispe, which signifieth ouer-looking (because there they called God to ouer-see and be witnesse to their covenant) it is plaine by the place, Gen. 31.49. that in these parts there was not onely a Towne, but likewise a Region called Mispe, it appears, Ios. 11.3. where we read of the Chinuites vnder Herman, in the Countrey of Mispe, *the Towne of Mispe, as it seemes both by this place, and in the eight verse following, being not in the Hill Countrey, but in the valley. But seeing that Iephia the Iudge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob, (whither his brethren had druen him) dwelt in this Towne of Mispe, who doubtlesse was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seeme that they doe not well which place this Towne of Mispe rather in Gad, than in Manasse. By Idus Maschabeus this Towne of Mispe (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and males of it slaine: for it was then posselt of the Ammonites.

Betweene Succoth (of which we haue spoken) and the Riuer Iaboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; a place where the face of God was scene: so called for memorie of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishnesse of which Citie, in refusing to relieue Gideon, was the cause that in his returne he ouerthrew their Towre, and slew the chiefe Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, then adde Rogelm, the Citie of that great and faithful subiect Burysilla, as it seemes, not farre from Machanaim, where he sustained King David, during Abisaloms rebellion. To these they adde the Towne of Gaddi, Arnon, & Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more then Gaddita, is ignorantly made a name of a place: Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Towne, but fill of a Riuer. Alimis Adrichomius frames of Alimus, 1 Mac. 5.26. so that the name should rather be Alema, but Iunius out of Iosephus reads Malle, for this in Alimis: and vnderstanding Malle to be per for Atillo, and thus becaus much as Munitio, (as we haue shewed touching the Atillo of the Sichemites) hee takes this Malle, to be Mispe Moabiturum, of which 1 Sam. 22.5. As for that Magelb which Adrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mabacath, which Mosis noeth to be as farre as the furthest of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Mac. 5.10. (which Iunius takes to be a Rithma, of which Numb. 33.18. a place of strength in the Territorie of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vincerum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Iephia 3. pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seemes by that place of the booke of Iudges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both farre remoued from the Gadites. But the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites was neuer, and not farre from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbath, as Deut. 3.11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that Philadelphia* which Ptolomee findes in Calofrya. Hierome and Callistus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seemes neuer posselt by the Israelites, after the ouerthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length became the Regall seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who hauing beene first beaten by the Assyrians, and their assistantes (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Sir had beene) were afterwards the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumeans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerours for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hebron had disposselt Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and betwene them recovered the best part of all the Valley, betwene the Mountaines and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two, Mosis and Israel found all those Cities and Countreys which were giuen to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450.yeeres since that these Zamzummims or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing these two Kings of one kinred, and both valiant and vndertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered againe much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sonnes of Lot ouer the mountaines, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captains of Persia and Assyria, (remembered in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom, so by that great conquest which Mosis had ouer those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunitie to looke backe againe into those plaines; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manasites forsooke the worship of the liuing God, and became sloathfull and licentious, they taking the advantage inuaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their masters, sometime their tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God. and according to the wisdom and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the yron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Dauids time, and the inhabitants slaine with great seuerity, and by diuers torments. At the first assault thereof Vrias was shot to death, hauing beene by direction from David appointed to be employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Armie perished: and wherein David lo displeased God, as his affaires had ill successe afterward, euen to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich crowne of gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which as some expound it, was vfed to be put on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and vnder him twelue others.

The Mountaines which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomee calleth the hills of Hippus, a Citie of Calofrya: and Strabo Trachones*: the same which continue from nere Daniasus vnto the Desarts of Moab: and receiue diuers names, as commonly mountaines doe; which neighbour and bound diuers Countreys: for from the South part, as farre Northwards as Asteroth, the chiefe Citie of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead; from thence Northward they are knowne by the name of Herman, for so Mosis calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites Shenir, others Seir: of which name all those Hills also were called, which part Iudea and Thoma: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremie makes them all one, calling the high mountaines of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These mountaines are very fruitfull, and full of good pastures, and haue many trees which yeelde Balsamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Riuer of this Tribe are the waters of Nimral, and Dibon, and the Riuer Iaboc: Others doe also fancie another Riuer, which rising out of the Rockes of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wanne from Og the King of Basan.

His Tribe of Gad posselt halfe the Countrey of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabathæa, as well within as without the mountaines of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wanne it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Mosis did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot ouer the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the first Iudge of Israel, the Ammonites ioyned with the Moabites against the Hebrewes, and so continued long. Iephia Iudge of Israel had a great conquest ouer one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them againe.

Afterward we finde that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nabab: who besieging Liber Gilead, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he rendered so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame riuer Iaboc winding about it, but in the place of Sehon 27. whence he gathers this opinion, Iunius reads intercepti Ab vide agadi, if wee will read with others, cepti reuben equarum et canon be taken of Rabba it selfe, but of some Fort ad ioyning. Gen. 14.

flame vpon Israel because those Gileadites vsing to carry a Target on their left armes, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be vtterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and deliuered them from that danger. This Nabab, as it may seeme, became the confederate of Dauid, hauing friended him in Sauls time, though Iosephus thinks that this Nabab was slaine in the battaile, when Saul raised the siege of Tabor, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hannun succeeded Nabab: to whom when Dauid sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirme the former friendship which he had with his Father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithstanding the aydes received from the Ammonites subiect to Adadzezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacab, and from Israhel, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouer-turned: their chiefe Citie of Rabbah, after Philadelphus, was taken, the Crowne which weighed a talent of gold was set on Dauids head; all such as were prisoners, Dauid executed with strange cruelty; for with Sawes and Harrowes he tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into Lime-kils.

Iosaphat gouerning Iuda, they assited the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were againe by Iehoram inforced to continue that Tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundredth talant of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeeres.

The fift King of the Ammonites, of whose name we reade, was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechias: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Balis sent Ismael of the bloud of the Kings of Iuda, to slay Gedaliah, who serued Nabuchodonosor.

§ VII.

Of the other halfe of Manasse.

He reft of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Oz in Basan, with the Land of Hir, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of * Basana, Gaulonitis, Geffuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the h. Ie Tribe of Manasse ouer Jordan, of which those three latter Prouinces defended themselves against them, for many ages. But Basana Ptolomie stretch further off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desert: and all those other Prouinces before named with Petraea, and Iudea, he nameth but as part of Calofyria; as farre South as Rabbah or Philadelphia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, fauing the Land nere the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petraea: for many of these small Kingdomes take not much more ground then the County of Kent.

Basan, or after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it selfe from the Riuer of Iaboc to the * Atchatti and Geffuri: and from the Mountaines to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattell. It had also the goodliest Woods of all that part of the world: especially of Oakes, which beare mast of which the Prophet Zacharias, Howle, O ye Oakes of Basan, and by reason hereof they bred so many Swine, as 2000. in one Herd were carried head-long into the Sea, by the vncleane spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it therefore Cities walled and defended: all which, after Oz and his sonnes were slaine, Jair, defended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Countrie after his owne name, Aunah Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

The principall Cities of this halfe Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella sometimes Butis, otherwise Berenice; by Selucus King of Syria, it is said to haue bene called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Sonne Alexander the Great were borne. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Lameus King of the Tewes: because it refused to obey the Tewes lawes: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Gouernement of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim by the Riuer of Iaboc, taken by 4 Indus Maccabeus: where he ser on fire the Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thercunto for Sanctuary; and nere it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2 Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong Citie of Ephron nere Jordan: which refusing to yeelde passage to 3 Indus Maccabeus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

Tabor, Gilead, or Tabeur, was another of the Cities of this halfe Tribe, which being belleged by Nabab King of the Ammonites, was deliuered by Saul, as is elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens recoouered, embalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his Sonnes: which hung despitfully ouer the wals of Bethsan or Sythopelia. Gadara, or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Plinie on a Hill nere the Riuer Hieromias, which Riuer Orontes seemes to thinke to be Iaboc. As the force of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Macbarus. Alexander Lameus after ten months siege wan it, and subuered it; Pompey restored it: and Cabinus made it one of the five Courts of Iustice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath or Amathus the third, Nierica, and Sephora in Galilee, the fourth and fift. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Afcalonitis, accused him to Iulius Cesar of many crimes: but perceiving that they could not preuaile, and that Herod was highly fauoured of Cesar, fearing the terrible reuenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by leaping ouer high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei, in which Iosephus ant. 5. 13. saith Sebeiba was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Iud. 12. 7. Sepulchrum est in Ciuitate sua Gilead, (for in one Crisostomus Gilead) imagine Gilead to be the name of a Citie, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Macc. 5. 26. where it is readeth Caphor for Cherbon; the same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ample & firma Gilead Arum. Cinias so of one Citie Hebron or Cherbon, which they call Efsebon, the chiefe Citie of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, hee imagineth two more: this Caphor in Manasse, and a Citie in Gad which he calleth Cashon, of which we haue admoniſhed the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the backe of a Cammell), which Iosephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis ouer against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, seeth this Iosephus in the fourth booke of the Iewish warre: where hee describeth the place by nature to be almost inuincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Iosephus with much danger of his owne person, entring it, was at first repulled, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping downe the rockes with their wiues and children, to the number of five thousand, there perished: besides foure thousand slaine by the Romans: so that none escaped, save onely two women that had themselves.

About foure miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Iosephus placeth Hippus or Hippene, whence Ptolomie giues the name to the hills that compass the plaines in which it standeth: so that it may seeme to haue bene of no small note. It is seated farre from the hill Countrie: on the East of the Lake, as also Plinie noteth Iub. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herods Tetrarchie: It was wasted by the Iewes, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were enraged against their borders.

The next Citie of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrehi or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: and nere vnto this his Regall Citie, it was that he lost the battaile and his life. It stood in S. Hierome time: and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not farre from these Townes nere Jordan, in this valley stood Gerafa or Gergefa, inhabited by the Gergefites, descended of the fift sonne of Canaan. Of these Gergefites we reade Mat. 8. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where casting the Diuels out of the possessed, hee permitted them to enter into the herd of Hogges: in which storie, for Gergefites or Gergefins, S. Luke and S. Marke haue Gadarens: not as if these were all one (for Gergefa or Gerafa is a distinct Towne in these parts from Gadara) but the boynds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This Citie receiued many changes and calamities: of which Iosephus hath often mention.

tion. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annii Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the yeere 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same yeere recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Hierusalem: and by him viceroy razed. Neere vnto Gerasi is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriack Mageda, or after the Greeke Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a signe from heaven: the same place or some adioyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmannuthi. By the circumstances of which storie it appears that this coast lay between the Lake of Tiberias and the Countrie of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one, and findes it to be Phale, the fountaine of Jordan according to Iosephus: but this Phale is too farre from the Sea to Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmannuthi. For as it appears by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Defart of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five Barley loaves and two Fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Iturae and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberius, called Julias, as hath beene farther spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Julias, to be the same as Bethsaida. Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Mat. 23 threw; Woe be unto thee Corazim.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrie adioyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og, King of Bashan. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth Carnaim, whence 1. Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim; as Ios. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth Carnaim, whence 1. Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim. The word Carnaim significth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the Image of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deuteronomie significth sheepe. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to have beene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heros radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex reliquo giganteum, with the words, Ios. 13. 12. Og ex reliquis Raphaeum: but if the Karnaim (or Carnaim) were these Raphai, the word would not have beene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis haue said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for periphrasis: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazim. This Citie (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the booke of Iudith, and there are that of this Citie vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and herethe Sepulchre of Iob is yet to be seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vñe in that place of Iudith, and ioyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not hercabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scenitis Cedar, it is apparent, and as euident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolori, much more than any vnder the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petraea, farr from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certaine that the Arabians and Syracens (holding those places) should rather by finding his Countrie seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countrie was, and build vnto him such Breidenbach.

Of Iob himselfe, whether he was the same Iobab remembered in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esau, and King also of Idumaea, though Rupertus, Lyrannus, Oleaster, and Belzarius are of another opinion, yet S. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregory, with with Athanasius, Hippolytus, Irenaeus, Eusebius Emisenus, Apollinaris, Eustachius and other, cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Eugenerius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hus or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke Ὠς, which the Septuaginta vñe for the word Hus, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1. v. 1. Sometime Aulius, as Hierome. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palastina and Galilee, besides Chamaia (or Hamaia) vnder Palmyrene in the Countrey called by Ptolomeus Trachonitis or Bathanea, the bounds of which Countreies are confounded with Bashan, in this halfe Tribe of Manassis. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where he reckons the Habites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israhelites, whom hee therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneum turban, because their bounds were not onely ioyned but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Hieremy, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same propheticke, of which hee speaketh in the five and twentieth Chapter, must needs be expounded: as Iunius reads them, distinguisheth the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edom, o que habitas in terra Hutz; O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguiish, but readeth Filia Edom que habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as we haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by it Idumaea or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Edumaea. For it is very probable that Esaie when he first parted from Iacob, did not seate himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Iudea, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountaines otherwise called Galaad, and Herman, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shemir for Seir; and from this his habitation did Esaie encounter Iacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esaie his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posterity of Esaie inhabited Seir to the South of Iudea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also drue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence forward seated themselves to the South of Iudea, bordering the Desart Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Desarts as farre as Hor where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinks in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23, or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abraham's brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue beene lost: and partly because in Iob 6. 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iob's friends, which seemes to be of Iob's owne Countrey, is called a Buzite, of Euz the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Hieremie 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named betweene) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our coniecture, that in the place of Iob 32. Elihu the Buzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Scm, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he saith that one of Iob's friends (which must beedee be this Elihu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place hee confesseth so much expressly,) and in as much as he readeth not 2 familia Aram, or Ram, but 2 familia Syria; like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Iob's friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Familie, or of the Familie of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindred, as also by the Septuaginta addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ansiu, it is implied that they thought only Elihu to haue beene of Iob's owne Countrie.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the iourne from Acon Eastward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shuach the sonne of Abraham and Keura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Saccari. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom

K k

Eliphaz

Eliphaz was, to haue beene of Arabia the Desert: and Eliphaz himselfe to haue beene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Efan. And so also Nahamah, whence Tjophar the third of Iob's friends (which in this place of Iob c. 2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned expolitor, thought either to be named of Thimnah by transposition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sonnes of Esa that gaue denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nahamah, which Ios. 15. 41. is reckoned for a Citie of Iuda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that neere the Land of Hus, in Basim, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manasse, there is a Region which at least in later times was called Suita, or of some like name.

De Bell. Sac. l. 22. c. 15. & 22. For this is evident by the Historie of Willichius Tyrinus, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he calls it diuersly) of exceeding great strength and vñ for the retaining of the whole Countrey: which, in the time of Baldwine the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians: hauing not long before beene lost to the great disadvantage of the Countrey, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrinus described to be sixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius foure miles Northward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manasse named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Behefthera, Misspa of Gilcad, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Misspa of Gilead, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Iosephus. Behefthera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basim by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Beiser or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Iosias) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Iosephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the midst betwene Caesarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brocard: otherwise more constricted, leauing the marsh ground on both sides, for Lions and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrey of Manasse, Iosephus names two places of strength, fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Iewes rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauram, and Chafar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West, of which three Cities we read Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place Numb. 34. 8. where for Chauram, between Tsedad, and Chafar-Henan, Zipbron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Auruntia regio, in Iosephus and Tyrinus, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Machab or Mascat), which were likewise borders to Manasse toward the North-east, are vnknowne: onely that Gessur was of might, it appears in that Dauid married Mahab the Daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautifull, but wicked, and vnfortunate Abshalon.

CHAP. XI.

The Historie of the Syrians the chiefe borderers of the Israelites that dwelt on the East of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the Citie of Damascus, and the diuers fortunes thereof.

DAMASCUS of all other in this Border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beautie, antiquitie, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnesse; and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith Iosephus, think it to haue beene built by Hus the sonne of Aram: of which opinion

Ioseph. l. 14.

S. I.

S. Hierome vpon Esa seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward; a thing very vnlike, seeing the Citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damisco. Dauid was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Iuda, after the ouerthrow of Adadecer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recouered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principallitie: but Dauid hauing ouerthrowne Hadadezer king of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba or Zobah) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, invaded Damascena, and posselt Damascus it selfe, and became an enemie to Salomon all to his life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from Dauid and Isab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypt's wiues sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning againe, became an enemie to Salomon all his life, and (as some writers affirme) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence-out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians and then the Grecians succeeded. This Citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Abanah and Parphar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chrysorrhoea the golden riuier. Iunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitfull of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Cattle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that Citadell. Against this Citie the Prophets Amos, Esa, Hieremie, and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglathphalassar imited by Acha King of Iuda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leauing of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was vtterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome vpon Esa: which thing was performed by Salmanassar, according to Iunius in his note vpon that place, fye yeeres after the Prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: S. Hierome liuing, as hee affirmeth vpon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Haomar their King from the Romans, in the yeere of our redemption 636. And in the yeere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewes King of France, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbaross afterward Emperour, Theodrick Earle of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recouer Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the yeere 1262. Hilon the Tartar incompass it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the wals, and threatned extream torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Hilon was by his father made King thereof.

In the yeere 1400. Timberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that region, and besieged the Citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken). He entered it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Cattle which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Cattle adioyning: hee forbore the demolishing of the Citie in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lanternes of gold and siluer: but while hee invaded Egypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his returne after three moneths siege hee forst it: the Mohometans prostrating themselves with their priests, desired mercie: But Timberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophy of his victorie hee raised three Towers with great Art, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this it was restored and reposselt by the Soldane of Egypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yeere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians:

in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mabometians, and Christians, of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hu the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Dauids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan; and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Storie: But were it so that it had some reguli, or petty Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adad prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie callth Nubæ, inhabiting betwene Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land, there were three chiefe principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adad of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adad when Dauid invaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth, the leader of those liege lords, which were leuiued and sent to Hadad-Itzer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adad, Rezon, the Commander of his armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adad and Adad of Damascus being both blaine. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath or Iuraa, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adad was utterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dolo saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Israhelians and Israhelites. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I meane of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iuraa, to which I may adde Gissur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing invaded that Region, and left Ioab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed, fled into Aegypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before, who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Ioab (whom indeede all the bordering Nations feared) he returned againe, and as Banning thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, Adad the sonne of Echob, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that Principallitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grew powerfull, tooke vpon him the style of Adad, the great god of the Affyrans, saith Macrobis, which signified oncelike or Prince. I also finde a Citie called Adad in the same part of Syria: of which, whether these Princes took the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad, Eber-Adad, Eli-Adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adad was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid vndertook the warre: secondly, because hee leuiued 22000. Aramites out of the Territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascians had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name; thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adad was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desert as far as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adad, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the cull that Adad did, the cull that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Aegypt: to wit, 23. yeeres after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hexion; to Hexion succeeded Tabremmon, or Tabremmon to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings; For Azi King of Idu the son of Abiam, the son of Reboam, the son of Salomon, being vexed & invaded by Bashtu, the successour of Nadab, the son of Iroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon the sonne of Hexion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Bashtu sought to fortifie Rama against Azi: thereby to block him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Azi, hauing receiued his presents, willingly invaded the Countrey of Nephtholim, and tooke diuers Cities, and spoiles thence: Azi in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Bashtu had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vse.

This Benhadad his Father Tabremmon was in league with Azi; and so was his Father Hexion: for Azi requieth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprise of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father took from thy Father, I will restore: and thou shalt make freetrees or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samarita. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeede to Benhadad which invaded Bashtu, at the request of Azi: But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Azi and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betwene the invasion of Benhadad the first, in Bashtu time, and the siege of Samarita, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the reignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Bashtu, and after that 49. yeeres ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon invaded Bashtu and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samarita, by a fall of 700. Israhelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israhelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crushed by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom he rendereth those townes that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and assiegeth the Citie, being assisted by Iosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Naaman, to Ioram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samarita againe, and being terrified thence from heaven, he departeth home, and sickneth, and sendeth Israhel with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might liue. Aziel returning, smothereth him. Zonarus and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adir, and the sonne of Adir: Amos and Hieremie mention the towres of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that Benhadad and his successour Aziel were worshipped for gods by the Syrians to his time, for the presumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeeres are compleate since their warres with the Israhelites.

Hazel or Aziel, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Elphaz or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Ben- hadad should recover his present sickness: He waged warre with Ioram; who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Isebel, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah, or Ochozias, are slaine by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azel continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Geth, but by gifts from Iosias he was averted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Iehofaphat, Iehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Iuda had dedicated, and which he himselfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Azidai did present Benhadad with those treasures, when he invited him to warre vpon Baalba King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betwene Iosias and Azel, yet a part of his Armie spoiled the other Provinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azel vexed Iosias the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitie, as he left him but fifty horsemen, ten Chariots, & ten thousand footemen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the latter Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

AFTER Haazel, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Haazel, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill successe: for Iosias King of Israel, the sonne of the unhappy Joachaz, as hee was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three severall battels: and hee lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Haazel had taken violently from Israel.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Haazel, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Iosiphus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Iosias recovered Damascus & Chamatham Iehuda pro Israel; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamath of Iuda; for these Cities sometimes conquered by Dauid, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Iehozas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Haazel, and had recovered the Cities which Haazel had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdom to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosiphus Rufus, after Zonaras Rasfon, the 10. Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacis King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and bearing off the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who took him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads: and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

- 1 Adad, the sonne of Rehob.
- 2 Rezin the sonne of Eladad, or Razin.
- 3 Hezion.
- 4 Tubremmon.
- 5 Benhadad, who invaded Baalba.
- 6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.
- 7 Haazel, whom Elisha foretold, with tears, of his advancement; the same who overthrow Ioram King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Haazel which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Haazel which took Geth, and compounded the warre with Iosias, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more, more, after the first Hazel which stilled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Iosias began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazel took Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazel that took Geth, was not the same with Hazel that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth, the second person in the kingdom, and Commander of Benhadads men of warre. To this Hazel, be he the first or second, succeeded:

8. Benhadad the third, whom Iosab King of Israel thrice overthrow.
9. Rezin or Rezin the last, who ioynd with Pekah King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicholaus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Geffur, we finde that Tobu was King of Emath or Chamath in Dauids time, to whom he sent his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauids victory against Adadezer. Also Sennacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IIII.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, never recovered themselves againe.

IN Geffur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmat, and his Father Ammihur. To Talmat, whose daughter Dauid married, it was that Abisalon fledde, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sophena or Syria, Soba or Calofrya, there are two named, Rehob or Rehob the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himselfe, and it is plain that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioynd Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desert of Arabia with other Provinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with Dauid, so it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Abaz King of Juda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the region of Soba, and took Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem gouerned Israel) who stooped the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his state at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding to excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betwene Israel and Judah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapp'd in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, hee carried it (as is before remembered) and then with great ease possesse himselfe of the Cities of Nephtholim, leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanasser, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabonassar, after the reuolt of Hosea, forced Samarit, and rent the Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered, the Kingdom of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanasser overthrow; happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly vetterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeres after the captiuitie of Israel, and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeere of Hofea: that of Iuda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held allo the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeere of Salmanassar, to the last of Balsassar, whom 3603. Herodotus calleth Labyntus: in all about 200. yeeres. After theſe the Persians from 3811. ruo to Darius their laſt King, held Syria about 200. yeeres.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his ſucceſſors the Seleucide reigned therein, till it became ſubiect vnto the power of the Romanes, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in poſſeſſion of the Turke, as ſhall be ſhewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering vpon the Iſraelites: with whom they had moſt to doe both in warre and peace, being the onely people, whole Hiſtory in thoſe ancient times carried an afflu- rent face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

OF THE TRIBE OF BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of diuer memorable places in the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitſpa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibba.

F the Tribe of Beniamin, the twelfth and yongest ſonne of Isach, whom he had by Rachel, there were muſtered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deſarts, entered the Holy Land of their iſſues 45600. fit to beare Armes: and theſe had their Territory on this ſide Jordan: betweene Iuda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neereſt Jordan, are Lod, Hadad, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shimead a Beniamite: they were all three re-inhabited by Beniamites, after the returne out of Captiuitie, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Eſd. 2. 35. where Adrichemius reading Lod, Hadad, Ono, makes beſides Hadad in Nehemia, a Citie called Lodhadad: This Hadad or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Macchabeus.

1 Chron. 8. 12.

Macc. 12. 38.

Samarim or Tſemairam, named of Tſemary, one of the ſonnes of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land ſtandeth Iericho, one of the Toparchies, and the laſt of Iuda, ſeated in a moſt fruitful valley, adorned with many palm-trees: and therefore elſewhere called the Citie of Palmes. From the time of Iofua, who vterly deſtroyed it, it lay waſte vntill the time of Achab: in whole dayes Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the loſſe of Abiram his eldeſt ſonne, and built the gates of it in the loſſe of his yongelt ſonne Segeb: according to the curſe of Iofua: in which and other reſpects, Iof. 1. 2. 14. calleth Iofua a Prophet. In after-times it was deſtroyed by Peſſaſan, and rebuilt by Adrian.

Iof. 6. 2.

1 Chron. 6. 60

This Iericho is called Ierico

meth, whence they make a new Citie Al-meth, 1318

The Tribe had given five Cities to the Leuites.

To the South-eaſt of Iericho ſtood * Halmon of the Leuites, of which Iof. 21. 18. To the South Bethbaraba, of which Iof. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is ſo much mention in the Scripture, where Iofua firſt ate of the fruits of the land, circumciſed all thoſe borne in the Deſarts, and celebrated the Paſſeouer.

The reaſon of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it ſeemes by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the coming of the Iſraelites into Canaan) is noted Iof. 5. 9. Ob deuolutionem probri Aegyptiaci, becauſe their fore-skinner (the people being there circumciſed) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Collis preputiorum. This Gilgal was alſo called Geli-loth, as appears by comparing the places, Iof. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Iof. 22. 13. and Geli-loth ſignifieth borders. It ſtood (though in ſome diſtance) directly Eaſtward, ouer againſt the two * Hills Garazim and Hebal: vpon the one of which the bleſſings, and on the other the curſings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the ſituation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitſpa of Beniamin (of which alſo we read oft in the Scripture) were ſeated about the midſt of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reaſon * S. a 1 Sam. 7. 13. muel choſe theſe two places, to either of which he came yearly to giue iudgement to the Iſraelites: of which two, Gilgal (as is ſaid) was neere Jordan on the Eaſt ſide of this Tribe; and Mitſpa neere the Weſt Sea, towards the land of the Philiftims.

The third place, which is named with theſe two, whither alſo Samuel viſed yearly to come, is Bethel: which alſo was ſeated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal: Tunius in this place, ſin Re-thel reads Dei forum, and interprets it, Kernall where the Ark abode, (or ſaith he) where it was lodged at Gilgal. At the ſame Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was by the Law, that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitſpa, whither Samuel came yearly to giue iudgement, there alſo were often the greateſt meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife againſt Gibba, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. were to bee, 1. and another againſt the Philiftims, 1. Sam. 7. 12. Thither alſo Iudas Macchabeus gathered the Iewes, (when Hierusalem was poſſeſt by the Heathen) as it is 1. Macc. 3. 47. In place doth not which place this reaſon of their meeting is added; Quia locus Oratorum fuerat Mitſpa ante Iſrael. Touching this Mitſpa, to auoid conſuſion, it is to be remembered, that the Scripture mentioneth four places of this name: Mitſpa of Iuda, of which Iof. 15. 38. Mitſpa of Gilead, of which we haue ſpoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mitſpa of the Moabites, ſid vnto where Dauid for a while held himſelfe, commending his Parent to the King of Moab, 1. Sam. 22. 3. and laſtly, this chiefe Mitſpa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Iebusiſites, and alſo in the time of the Macchabees (as we haue ſaid) when Hierusalem was held by the vice-king Antiochus, ſo alſo in the time of Iheremie, after the deſtruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Iewry, (as Gouverneur ouer thoſe that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Iewes) hee was ſlaine by the treaſon of Iſmael, one of the royall bloud of Iuda, as then for the Citie Bethel through Tunius alſo ſid vnto the place where the Ark was, 1. Sam. 7. 13.

Neere vnto this Mitſpa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy againſt the Philiftims.

Touching Bethel which (as it ſeemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the miniſtring of Juſtice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the iſſue of Iofeph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is Nehem. Mitſpa of Ca- 11. 31. and Iof. 18. 22.) and how another Citie called Luz ⁴ neere adioyning to it, was leaſt of which built by the man of the Citie which ſhewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jude. 1. and of the occaſion of the name from Isach's viſion: and how Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calves heere, of Bethel (which ſignifieth the houſe of God) made it Beth-aen, that is, the houſe of Vanitie, Iof. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as alſo other memorable things of this the three quarters North, place, they are ſo well knowne, out of the Hiſtories of the Scripture, that we may well ſuppoſe them our.

The territorie of Bethel, which at the firſt belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Asia againſt Ieroboam (of which 2. Chron. 13.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdome of Iuda: and ſo it continued, as appears by the ſtorie of Iofua: which performed the Prophecies againſt the altar of Bethel, 2. Reg. 23. whence thoſe coaſts 1. Macc. 11. 34. are called Apherems, which Greeke word ſignifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. If they were as was one of the three Seignories or Præſectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Iewes, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2. Chron. 13. 19. was Hebrun, which Iof. 18. 23. is called Ephraim, becauſe it was of this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned in the continues of the Kingdomes of Iuda and Iſrael betweene Hai and Bethel. Iof. 7. 2. and 18. 12.

in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibba, and Gebah. Of the name Rama,^b it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many townes so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they finde out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seemes because Mat. 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochar and Breidenbach make Silo to have beene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seemes, wee have testimonie, Iof. 19. 29. and of another in Nephthalim, Iof. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1. Sam. 25. 1. which more often is called Kamathas, and 1. Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tophim: for which the Septuagint haue Aramathaim-tophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke Ioseph of Arimathas, Mat. 27. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we read 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, seated as we said, neere Bethel the viceroy most South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Basia in the time of Asa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flee from him to Asa. Of this Rama or Ramath I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because Ffd. 2. 26. neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Judas, as it appears Ffd. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plaine that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Basia had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1. Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Juda: whence 2. Reg. 23. 8. we read that Iofiah through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibba which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Judges had almost vicerly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished Esa. 10. 27. of which word^d Gibba, in another forme Gibbath, hee imagineth Gibbath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this citie also to Rama of Beniamin, appears Ind. 19. 13. where the Leuite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took vp his lodge in Gibba. By that place of 1. Sam. 22. 6. it seemes that there was in this Gibba some towne or Chadell called Rama: where Iunius reades in excesso, for in Rama: but it may be the Palace out of the Septuagint that the name of the Kings palace in this citie, was Rama: as it seemes that in Rama of Sarcel Iof. 2. 22. mucl, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode: was Nathoth. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Iof. 7. 2. is placed neere Beth-suen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Nehe. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Iof. 18. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Iof. 8. 28. In solitudinem in tumulum perpetuum. Another Citie of chiefe note is reckoned Iof. 18. 25. in this Tribe was Gibbon, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to fauour their liues, is set downe Iof. 9. whence they were reckoned among the Nethini or Proselites: and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of fauour the Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2. Sam. 21. 1. This Gibeon or Gibbon with Almon and Iebih (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Iof. 2. 128. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1. Reg. 2. 26. where Eliathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehe. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriath-iearim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudthied, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1. Sam. 21. 1. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe Nehe. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Esa. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gadlim and Atigrem in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Camp, 1. Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Macchabias his abode, 1. Macc. 9. 73. Of Galsala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any heere in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he faileth with his parents to Tharsis of this I find no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, & come to the Citie of Hierusalem and the Princes and Gouernours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Beniamin, whence Iof. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

What time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princeesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But * according to others, that Citie * See in the out of which Melchisedec encountered Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of Manasse the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the river of Jordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

Hierusalem (whensoever or by whomsoever built) was a principall Citie in Iofua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor or the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Iofua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: euentill Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusai (the children of Iebusens the sonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

Dauid, after he had by Gods assistance possesed it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increafe of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebusalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolyma. After Dauids time Salomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walles, could not any where in the world be exampled: and besides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rocke: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldom beene heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut asunder, Shishac King of Agypt, and his predecessor, hauing bred vp for that purpose, Asa and Idu, 2. Chron. 12. 2. mean, and Ieroboam, Salomons seruant, and both married to Aegyptians: the State by the one distressed, by the other broken: Shishac first invaded the Territorie of Juda, entered Hierusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all those spoiles which Dauid had gotten from Adadazer, Tobu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe sackt, and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ioss King of Israel; while Amasias the twelfth King thereof gouerned Juda. 2. Kings 16.

Not long after Achaz the fifteenth King of Juda impouerished the Temple, and presented Reglathaphasar with the treasures thereof. And Manasse the sonne of Ezekiah, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Me- 1. Chron. 3. 26. rodach, lost the remaine, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was againe spoiled by the Babylonians, Iakim then reigning. But this vngatefull, idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the City euen to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers which embraced them, euen and euell with the dust, carried away the spoiles with the Princes and people, and crushed them with the heauie yoke of bondage and seruitude full seuentie yeeres, in somuch as Sion was not onely become as a stone and plowed vp field, Hierusalem an heape of bone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) euen the birds of the ayre scorned to flie ouer it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soyle.

Then 70. yeeres being expired, according to the Prophecie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie difficultie enough: and the Citie meanelly inhabited, and without walls or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeeres, till Nehemia by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoyle by Bagages, or Vagages, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by Ptolomæus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crasus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberallitie of strangers. Before the captiuitie, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagus to the second Temple, was requited by the bountie of his sonne Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Iherusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that vürping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that hee left them farre more stately and glorious than they had bene in the dayes of Salomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Iherusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the coming of our Saniour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeeres. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Iewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Iewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Pasche: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the ciuill dissension, oppress them within the walles; a forcible enemie assailed them without. The Idumæans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Iewes Kingdome, thrust themselves into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleue that there had bene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towres (works most magnificent, and ouer-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garriſons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour bee the greater and more shining, that there-ouer became victorious.

After this, such Iewes as were scattered heere and there in Iudea, and other Prouinces, began againe to inhabit some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to reuolt, and rebell, Alisius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towres, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone vpon another, of that vngatefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulcher of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Aliacropolis. In the gate toward Bethel, hee caused a Sowe to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Iewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth euer enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palastina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres.

It was afterward in the 636. yeare after Christ, taken by the Ægyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeeres.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Bullon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when hee was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery, it remained vnder the successors of Godfrey fourecore and eight yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Ægypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes cast out the Ægyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarce, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Iherusalem alone that hath so oftentimes bene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World haue with their inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath bene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impietie of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by flauerie; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possesse; of the walls and buildings, yea of the soyle and the beasts that feede thereon.

For, euen that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertilitye, and fruitfulness; witnesse the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the daies of the Kings of Iuda and Israel: it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barren. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no nor any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe; neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned, but that his moucables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Iewes.

IF the originall of the Iewes, prophane writers haue conceiued diuersly and in- iuriouly. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Ægyptians. Others affirme that while Isis gouerned Ægypt, the people were so increased, as Ierusalem, and Iudas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidentall, because he was taken vp and saued out of the waters. But Iustine of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Iewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damasius, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among which he diuided the land of Iudas; so called of Iudas his eldest; who had the greatest portion. The yongest of the sonnes of Israel he calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in Ægypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Ioseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Ægypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Deserts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seauenth day, for this cause euer after obserued the seuenth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discovering their vncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Ægyptians. These and the like fables hath Iustine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the fifth booke of his owne Historie truly confessed of the Iewes, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Idumæa, the first parents of the Iewes.

Cited by Stephanus in Idumæa.

Cladius Iohann draws them from Judas, whose parents were Spartan and Thebius; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kindred of the Hebrewes: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports seeme to haue beene gathered out of diuine letters; though wrestled and peruered, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and dakered the Storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes: all which sayings, as touching the Iewes and their originalls, Iosephus against Appian, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originallie, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanns, the Greeke Grammarian, deriue the Hebrewes or Iewes, from Araxon; hauing mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Aram: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chiefe part were called Israel; another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Iudeans or Iewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the tenne Tribes, the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Iudeans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

Caleb f. 63.

The gouernement which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Aegyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and Leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselves to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before we intreat, we are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Iosua to the Warre of Troy: which was about the time of Iephtha.

§. I.

Of the inter-regnum after Iosua's death: and of Othoniel.

When Iosua was now dead, who with the aduice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to vnder-take the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious. In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew tenne thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrant crueltie, as elsewhere hath beene signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malici-

cious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods iudgements against himselfe.

The tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this interregnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Iosua) the Cities of Azotus, Ascalon, Ekron and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Iebusites after reedified. They tooke also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set downe in expresse words that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people; as Moses and Iosua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he with the aduice of Phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if to any think that they proceeded without a Chiefe, the good successe which followed their vndertakings witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb euen while Iosua gouerned, as appeares, Ios. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Capitaines: for the performance of which enterprize, hee promised his Daughter Achisah: which he performed to Othniel his yonger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that seruice was such, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Iudge soone after. But while those of Juda made warre with their borderers, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not driue out the inhabitants of the Valleyes, because they had Chariots of Iud. 1. 19. 20. 39m.) The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories: in which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Ioseph recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plaine Countries, and fort them to saue themselves in the Mountaines. And now the Israelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often hee had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Elders beeing also consumed, who better aduised them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely ioyne themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idols of Baal, and Aseroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had prouoked with their idolatry, deliuer them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia: whom Chusai Kishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeeres, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othniel to be their Iudge and Leader: who by Gods assistance, deliuered his brethren from oppression: and enforced the Aramites to returne into their owne Disarts, and into Mesopotamia adioyning; after which the Israelites had peace fourtie yeeres, during all the time of Othniels gouernment. This Othniel is thought by Tostatus to haue beene the yonger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Jud. 3. 10. hee is twice called Othniel the Sonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother. Others doe rather interpret those words (Calebs yonger brother) as if they signified the meanest of his kinred. Indeed it is not likely, that Calebs Daughter should marrie with her owne Vnkle; yet it followes not therefore that Othniel should haue beene the meanest of the kinred. Wherefore wee may better thinke that hee was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephunneh, and Othniel the sonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his yonger brothers sonne; to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Cousin German Calebs daughter.

How long it was from the death of Iosua to the gouernment of Othniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to haue beene no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Lush was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that betwene the times of Iosua and Othniel that ciuill Warre brake out betwene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Leuites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Jud. 17. 6. 28. 19. Juda ledde the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was hee commanded to doe against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craued, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to haue beene when Iosua was dead, & before the gouernment of Othniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Gouvernors, were spent vnder such oppression of Strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attempted such a ciuill Warre, if their power had beene as great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they lo weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

Here liued in this Age of Othoniel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fift King of Athens: who began to rule in the twentieth yeere of Othoniel, and gouerned fortie yeeres. Hee was Father to Erichtheus: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater: vnder whom Linus the Musician liued. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharjys, were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of iron: but Genesis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunning: lic both in iron & brasse. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus gouerned Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Græcians and other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vines vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee hath desired his pedigree may finde it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him native of Asia: and the sonne of Eleusius King of Eleusina: which Eleusius by carefull indoltrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prowe a grauen or carued Serpent: who because hee made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othoniel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow: for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so confident with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeere when they began to rule) haue hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne works, but coniecture: Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne, but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reignes of Heathen Kings & Princes; but euen in the computation of those times which the indisputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth, and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the Ieuentic Weekes, and in what not: Wherefore the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, & contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue sought by so many wayes to vneouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeere, I auow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a priuate opinion: which I submit to better iudgements. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad vnam querenda; In ancient things wee are not to require an exalt narration of the truth, sayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that liued about those times.

After the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God encouraged Moab to invade and suppress them: to performe which he ioynd the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readie findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feele the difference betweene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perils: within which they were so speedilie folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eightene yeeres vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, hee turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguiish, hee assured himselfe of the following victory: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, laden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining priuate access vpon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierst his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, he did repasse Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, ouerthrew their Armie consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Samar his Successor had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourecore yeeres from the death of Othoniel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, trauielled into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth isto be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourecore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hypponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephissus, which elsewhere hee calleth Chemer, if hee meane not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus ioynded themselves, they agreed together to recouer her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him: and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering Theseus out of Hell. But Zeus, as I take it, hath writtne his storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, saith hee, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres his Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken: and because Pyrithous was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for foode to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Euripheus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus inhabiting nere the Mountaines of Findus: of which Mountaines Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to bee in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessaly: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopei, saith Plutarch in his Greeke questions.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erichon, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the Northwinde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus rauished Philomela, of which the fable was deuised of her conuersion into a Nightingale. For Tereus hauing married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that shee might not complaine; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercilesse behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle vpon cloth, and sent it to Progne. In reuenge whercof Progne caused her onely sonne Ity, to bee cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so dreft as it appeared to be some other ordinary foode: of which when hee had eaten his fill, shee caused his head, hands, and feete, to bee presented vnto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets faigned, that shee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pausanias hath built nere the Rocks Mergi, in the Territorie of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things to are supposed to haue beene done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appeares that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in O- drysa, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countie in Greece not farr from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thraci- ans: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good to beleue, saith Thucydides, that Pandion
King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might haue succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should haue held the Kingdome of Odrysa, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue beene partly because, as Pausanias sayes; Daulis nec uisitant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines: As if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for euer after haue that place.

Nere this time Melampus (who is said to haue vnderstood the voyces of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee restored to their former health the Daughters of Prætor King of the Argiues, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Tuno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to bee constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did vse often to plough with Kine.

In the feuen and fortieth year of Ehud, Troas began to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name; about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delpoi, deuised the Heroicall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was deuised the fable that some Poets haue applied to the passion of Ioue: and some to the couetous that dare not inioy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the sonne of Iupiter, by the
be the son of Iupiter: as some will haue it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he caused his owne Sonne to be flaine and dreft to the banquet:
of whom Ceres ate part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seek after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was deuised, that hee had alwaies Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ouid:

Quar

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and doth misse
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which Hor- acius Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise and say, That Tantalus, though hee excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against couetousnesse:

Tantalus à labijs suis fugientia captas
Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is faigned of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Coetæncis conuiuiis Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue.
To guests of his owne age, to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Diuinitie ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneest meates in a foule stomack, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reuerend mysteries are often peruerted by an vnclane and defild minde.

To you it is giuen (saith Christ in Matthe) to know the myserie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things be done in parables. So is it said of him that hee expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzen in-ferre vpon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset effari ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem ce- lestium & vñ, ad illud progesio suppeditauit, fortasse deo, nobis aliquid amplius constaret; if Paul might haue uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third heuen; and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Reucelin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Asino lyram expone-re, aut myseria, que ita reciperet, vii. Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & vnguentum Scarabæus:
quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arcana patefacerent, que meditando faciliter, quam loquendo apprehendantur. To set an Asse to a harpe, or to learne myseries:
which he would handle as a Swine doth a trumpet, or a Tay a viall, or Scarabæus and vnclane flies sweaigme ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of so their couered meanings.

But to proceede with the contemporaries of And, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus liued whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Latoia. Eu- phorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Iupiter, to auoid Iuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where he was deliuered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the graue of this Gyane, affirms that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homere:

Por.

Hom. Od. 11.

Porcæ tu quæ noxam Titurus per iugera terra, Asiduas atro visere pascat aues.

Nine furlongs stretch lies Titurus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry birds with his renewing lucre daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terror of others, that he was kill'd eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Theſſalie liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first seru'd as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him aduanced; but hauing slaine Hyacinthus, he crost the Helleſpont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the wals of Troy, not by making the bricke leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which saith:

*Ilion aspiciet, firmataque turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ structa canore lyra.*

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with wals and towers high,
Built with the harpe of wife Apollo's Harmonic.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witness, saith Pausanias.

In these daies also of Ebud, or (as some finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, liued Perſeus, the sonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus, to seeke their aduention on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakely accompanied as he hunted, nere the Lake Triton, was surpris'd and slaine: whose beauty, when Perſeus beheld, he caus'd her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonish'd which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Euseb. in Chro.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or aſet Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their reignes, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon liued in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who incited by Antea or Sthenobis, the wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompanie her, but disſuading it, the accus'd him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, betweene him and his sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, employ'd him against Chimæra, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, sent him the winged Horſe Pegasus, sprung vp of the blood of Medusa, formerly slaine by the Souldiers of Perſeus in Africa, to transport him, a horſe that none other could master or bridle but Minerua: vpon which beaſt Bellerophon ouer-came Chimæra: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as hee returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those, he arriued to Iobates in safetie: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which hee grew so insolent, as hee attempted to flye vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disſuading, caus'd one of his stinging flies to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his backe, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heauen: and being fed in Iupiter's owne stable, Aurora beg'd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuerſly expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocency and vnderſerued aduerſitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was expos'd to extreme hazard, or rather certaine death, hee found both deliuerance and honour: but waxing out-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, hee was againe throwne downe into the extremities of sorrow, and euer during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearne, of which three beaſts this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horſe: to whom the inuention of sailes (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aeneas.

L. 5. Æneid.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Iouan) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue bene about Ebud's time: Homer calls them Iaones, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himselfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a custome obseruable in the Histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The inuasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Auguſtine makes him farre more ancient: placing him betweene the coming out of Ægypt, and the death of Iofua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ebud, and Samgar, Pelops, flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. IIII.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had liued in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ebud; and after him by Samgar; therest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peacere are the parents of idle securitie, so is securitie as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subserſion: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their finnes were againe ripe for punishment, Iabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ebud, inuaded the Territorie of Israel; and hauing in his seruice 900. yron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subiection twentie yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Prophetesse, who incouraged Barac to leue a force out of Nephtalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephtalim were more forward than the rest in this action; it may seeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Harosheth the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nephtalim. So in the dayes of Leſſia the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, pressed most vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ebud to deliuer Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Iael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest meanes. For the mighty Aſſyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and reſtleſſe, he ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchleſſe pride into the baſe humilitie of a Beaſt. And to approue that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by inuiſible strength, as when hee slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as hee did the Egyptians in Noſes time: sometime by dead bodies, as when hee drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea: and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iofua: sometimes by the miniſterie of men, as when hee ouerthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the household ſeruants of Abraham. Hee caus'd the Moabites and Ammonites to fell vpon their owne confederate the Armie of the Edomites; and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the fight of Yehoshaphat: and of the like to these a volume of Chronicles examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah, the Prophetesse speake vnto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takeſt, shall not be for thine honour, for I and thou

the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Iabin fell to the ground, euen to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Iabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which Deborah giueth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfullnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weake estate wherinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or peece seene among forsie thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were seuered and amased, some of them confined ouer Iordan, and durst not ioyne themselves to the rest, as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Asherites kept the Sea-coast, and forsooke their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were disperfed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Merus, who dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Iael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondence with Iabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praise and thanks to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Iabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos which had continued 544. yeares, was translated to Mycena: The translation of this Kingdome Vines out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danau, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lynceus diided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos it selfe: Pratus his brother possist Ephra or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tirynthos, which witness Pratus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is fained that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with childe: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other worthy man, corrupted her keepers with gold: and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when hee grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vnwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Parricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Pratus: and built Mycena. This imprisonment of Danae, Strabo reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brazen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this witty obseruation:

Inclusam Danaen, turris athenae,
Robustaq. fores, & vigilum canum

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reigne in the first yeare of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time to the end of Sthenelus, Castor misreckoneth 400. yeares. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but at 417. Io was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

Phoroneus,
Apis,
Argus,
Piraeus, Phorbas,
Triopas, Crotopus, Sthenelus,
Danau, Lynceus,
Abas, Acrisius, Pelops.

After the translation to Mycena, Mar. Scotus findes these Kings:

Perseus,
Sthenelus,
Eurystheus,

Atrous and Thyestes } The sonnes of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atrous by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Agamemnon,
Aegisthus,
Orestes, Tisamenus, Penibulus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leaue out the two first, and the last: beginning with Eurystheus: and ending with Penibulus. In Tisamenus time the Heraclida returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas who reigned in Phrygia: and Ihsu who built Ihsu: with others mentioned in our Chronological table, as contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that liued in this Age.

Debora and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Iudge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enioyed any quiet or prosperity: the Iudge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to saue themselves, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in harvest time by themselves, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying all that grew vp: covering the fields as thicke as grasshoppers: which seruitude lasted seauen years.

Jud. 6. 6. & 7.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred vp Gideon the sonne of Josab, afterward called Terubbaal: whose feare and vnwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set downe in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts; Each of these 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which hee gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the cracke of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken: and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephraimites began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made warre without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt haue held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a milde answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tyred with traualle, and weary euen with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had sau'd themselves by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, fought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatned therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would teare the flesh of those of Succoth with Thornes and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie: if I may presume to make coniecture, it seemes likely, first that those Cities set ouer Jordan, & in the way of all inuasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, & were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebah and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow in the warre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their owne Country, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the fruit of contrary success. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should suffer hazzard and want, than that such men as they dislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or wherefoeuer it were that he refreshed himselfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surpris'd them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: and hauing put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he tooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideons brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request slew them with his owne hands: his Sonne whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his returne from the consummation of this merueilous victory, he tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soone after his death, according to that which hath beene said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are neuer left vnansw'd: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnusuall torments, so were his owne 70. sonnes all, but one, murdered by his owne bastard Abimelec. The like Analogie is obserued by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Egyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, others of them to be cast into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their own first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharao and his armie in the red sea. And hereof a world of examples might be giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraignie ouer them, and to establish him in the Government: which he refused, answering, I will not reigne ouer you, neither shall my childe reigne ouer you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden care-rings, which euery man had gotten. For the Israelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, vsed to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seuen hundred Shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. l. if we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. And because he conuerthed that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silke, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and set vp the same in his owne Citie of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Leuites vsed, and so did David when he danced before the Arke: and Samuel, while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained: we may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the armie came into the slaughter, and pursuit, for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephthalie, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: For this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

This liued with Gideon, Agave, the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euristheus King of Mycena: Atrius and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristheus, the Kingdome of Mycena fell into the hand of Atrius. This is that Atrius, who holding his brother in ialousie, as an attempter, both of his wife and Crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not vnreuenged. For both Atrius and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the lineage of Atrius died by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to haue beene done, which are written of Dadalus and Icarus. Dadalus, they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Atalys, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour: where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Egypt. Afterward he was laid to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cowe, satisfie her lust, a thing no lesse vnaturall than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperor Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater, of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appears by those verses of Martiall, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

*Iunctam Pasiphaen Diſco credite Tauro Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.

construction of it, thinking that Dadalus was of her counsaile, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with childe, and that the being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Monster Minotaur, halfe Man and halfe a Bull. But this practise being discovered, and Dadalus appointed to be slaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport him. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, Dadalus framed failes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he ouerwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention, Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold, was too ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dadalus, that he made Images that could moue themselves, and goe, because he carued them with legs, armes and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the body and head of those men, whom they cared to counterfeit, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarke, who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dadalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the sonne of Apollon, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamiris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Strab. l. 9.

Again, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue beeene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Armie, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnacceffible mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissoluing her problems, his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lyon for her cruelty. But that which Palephatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disproue it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her helpe he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despitefull part, with her owne troupe she held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans, till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. He possessed himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere seven of their sonnes: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thola. In the end he was slaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dadalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Ilands.

Arist. poll. 1.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Gyant, who was said to haue 60. and odde cubites of length, which though Plutarke doth con-firme, reporting that there was such a body found by Serapion the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lye. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was fained to be the sonne of the Earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Angustine affirms that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he ouercame, Plato expoun-deth to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

About the eleuenth yeere of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argo-nantes: of which many fabulous discourses haue beeene written, the summe of which is this.

Pelias the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Æson, who was Iasons father, reigning in Iolcus a town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollon to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, intreated Ia-son to him, who counting hastily, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what coult he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heed: to which question when Ia-son had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos, to fetch the golden fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, hauing a ship built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the counsell of Pollux: wherein he procured all the brauest men of Greece to saile with him: as Atys the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telemachus and Peleus sonnes of Æacus, and fathers of Atax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiarus the great Soothsayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde boare: Ascalaphus and Tal-minus of Almonia the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Læertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lyncus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyncus by Pollux; Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the beech of Dadonus, which could speake. They arrived first at Leucus; the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that looking thence by night they were driuen by contrary winde backe into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Hauen, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the same men:
but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blowes, insumch that the Argonautes slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceiued, with many teares they solemnized his funerall. Then departed they againe and arrived shortly in Myssa, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elates, who went to seek: Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Myssa, called Gior, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myssa the Argonautes sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient inhabitants of the Countrey, ouer whom Amycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whorlebars, in which kinde of fight he had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryces in reuenge of his death flew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmydessus, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: you shall doe well quoth he first of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be covered, and meat set on which was no sooner set downe, then that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged yong men saw this, they drew their swords, & pursued them through the ayre; some say that both the Harpies and the yong men died of wearinesse in the fight, & pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did couenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withall of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to adventure after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so, & perceiuing that the pigeon had only lost a piece of her taile, they observed the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of the poope was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have stood still: for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the river Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Soothsayer of their company was slain by a wilde boare; also here Tiphis died: and Ancaeus undertooke to heare the ship. So they passed by the river Rhenodon, and mount Caucasus, and came to the river Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchis. When they were entred the haven, Iason went to Aetes the King of Colchis, and told him the Commandement of Pelias, and cause of his coming, desiring him to deliver the golden Fleece, which Aetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe; if hee alone would do yoke together two brazen hooft bules, and plowing the ground with them, sowe dragons teeth, which Minerva had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These bules were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Pulcan had giuen them to Aetes.

Whilest Iason was in a great perplexity about this taske, Medea the daughter of Aetia, fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priniile to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine wherewith the bad him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedy which inconvenience, the bad him throw stones amongst them as soone as they came vp thicke, wherupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that hee might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile; whereto when the euent had answered, he againe demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so farre from approuing such his desire, that he deuised how to destroy the Argonautes, and burge their ship; which Medea perceiving, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the groue of Mars, where they say it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, she went with Iason into the ship Argo; hauing with her, her brother Abysrus.

Aetes vnderstanding the practises of Medea, provided to pursue the ship, whom when Medea perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in diuers places, of which Aetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Toni; the Greeke word signifieth Disiun. Afterwards he sent many of his subiects to seeke the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not backe Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus, which is Poin Italie.

Iupiter, offended with the slaughter of Abysrus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abysrides, there the ship Argo that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable, spake to them, and said, that the anger of Iupiter should not cease, till they came to Aisina, and were clenched by Circ, from the murder of Abysrus. Now they thereupon sayling betwene the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the sea of Sardinia and along the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Aea, wherein Circ dwelt, who clenched them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. One ly Butes swamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauished, and carried to Lysibeam in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing past the Syrens, they came betwene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoke. But Theseis and the Nereides, conueyed them safe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coasted Sicilie where the beewes of the Sunne were, and touched at Coreyra, the Island of the Phaeaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Meane while, the men of Colchis, that had bene sent by Aetes in quest of the ship of Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountaines of Coreyra, others in the Ilands Abysrides, and some coming to the Phaeaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if she were not Iasons wife, they should haue her; but if she were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arct, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherfore they of Colchis not daring to returne home, sayed with the Phaeaces; so the Argonautes departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this land, Minos reigned, who had a man of brasle giuen to him (as some of the Fables say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his body reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was clofed vp with a brazen nail, his name was Talus: his custome was to runne thrice a day about the land for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortall, she drew out the nail: that stoped his veine, by which meanes all his blood ranne out, and he died, others there are that say he was slain by Pan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes sailed to Argina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Argina they sailed by Euboea and Locris home to Iolcos, where they arrived, hauing spent foure whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Iason vnderstand the mystrie of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the welue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden booke of Parchment, which is of sheepe-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others would signifye by Iason, wisdom, and moderation, which ouer-commeth all perils: but that which is most probable is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeede to rob Colchis, to which they might arrive by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepe falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world; and the people there inhabiting vnto let many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and Currents in the passage betwene Greece and the bottome of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those fiery bules, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasle, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and aduentures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poetcall morals: all which Homer afterward vied the man of brasle excepted in the description of Vlisses his traualles, on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Iair, and of the Lapythe, and of Theseus, Hypolytus, &c.

AFTER the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offes had beene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraignie, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himselfe; who being easily moued with the glory, to haue a King of their owne; readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of silver of their idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabounds, to assist his first deceitfull enterprife, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wives, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Iotham the yongest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which he executed on one stone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath beene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-pow'rfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euermore) neither hath it respect to nature, which labourerth the preservation of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions which time wee must count her no lesse than fifteene yeeres old, for the women did not commonly begin so young as they doe now) she was then at least two and fiftie yeeres old at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stollen by Paris eight and thirtie: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnassus doe in effect consent, that the Citie was entred, and burnt in the first yere of Demophon King of Athens, the successor of Mnestheus, the successor of Theseus, seenteene dayes before the Summer Tropique; and that about the eleuenth of September following, the Troians crost the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeere, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and buidled Lavinium. But Saint Augustine hath otherwise, that when Polyphides governed Sicyon, Mnestheus Athens, Tautanes Assyria, Habdon Israel, then Aeneas arrived in Italie, transporting with him in twentie shippes the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and hereof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia Phelus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeeres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successors, Adrastus, who reigned foure yeeres, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iur, so is also Mnestheus King of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Poloponnesus. In Assyria, during the government of these two peaceable Iudges, Mitrus and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramfes, and afterwards Annemenes.

§. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greece Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held true) against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiection.

*Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerum, & mundi, semperque aeterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Tebanum, & funera Troie,
Non alius alij quoque res cecinerunt poetae?*

If all this world had no originall,
But things haue euer bene as now they are:
Before the sieg of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourese they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corne than was necessary for their sustentance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armor of Glauco was worth an hundred Beeves, and the copper armour of Dionides worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vsual exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenae the principall Citie in Poloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Poloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easily appeare to such as consider, what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the preface to his Historic. Wherefore, as in these latter times times, idle Chroniclers use when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to read; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or disc rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that fauoured of humanity before the time of the warre of Thebes: the briefe whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing bene cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Jocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, hee begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceesse of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the greivous murder and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe; and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her selfe. Some say that Oedipus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes because they suffered their father to be cast out of the Towne; and ayded him not. Howsoeuer it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should reigne one yeere, and the other another yeere; and so by coule rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeeres government reigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeere, hee refused to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fledde vnto Argos, where Adrastus the sonne of Talaus then reigned, vnto whose palace comming by night, he was driuen to seeke lodging in an out-house, on the backside.

There he met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fledde from Calidon: with whom struing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noyse, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembered an olde Oracle, by which hee was addit to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deiroke vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as he could draw to follow him, he was desirous among others to carrie Amphiarus the sonne of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is saide to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adrastus, did both vterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiarus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her husband to assit him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbad his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a iewel, that shee could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betwene Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eriphyle, cyther of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did lope a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to foresee than auoid destinie, sought for such comfort as reuenge might afford him, giuing in charge vnto his sonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre vpon the Thelians. Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which, the seven chiefe leaders were, him selfe, Amphiarus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (instead of whom some name Mes-siens) all Argines, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Aolian, and Parthenops the Arcadian (sonne of Melager and Alalamus). When the Armie came to the Nemaeon Wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water; this haing a childe in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argines to a spring: but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Hippolyte the daughter of Theas the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saved when the women of the Ile flew all the

the males by confpiracie, intending to leade an Amazonian life. For such her piece, the Lemnian widues did sell her to Pyrates, and the Pyrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemea, whose young sonne Ophelus or Archemorus, she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When vpon the childes death shee hid her selfe for feare of her master, Amphiarus told her sonnes where they should finde her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the child, and in memorie of the chance, did institute solemne funerals games called Nemean, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Arion, Tydeus with whombeats, Amphiarus at running and quoyting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus, a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slaine the Nemean Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is heere set downe.

From Nemea the Argives marching onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Couenants betwene him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolute to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enuy and malice of the people, who laid fiftie men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fiftie he slew all but one, whom he sent back to the Citie as a reporter and witnesse of his valour. When the Argives vnderstood how resolute Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is said to haue had at that time seuen gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very farre stronger, could force muster vp more thousands then Thebes had gates) did compass the towne. Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiarus at Proctis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopaus at Eletha, and Polynices at Hypsisia. In the meane season, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them, tooke aduise of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans, if Ateneus the sonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vow himselfe to be slaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Diuell, so enuious at his Creatours glory, that hee not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice with all Diuine worship, but commandeth vs to offer our selues, and our children vnto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens vnderstanding, and bewitched their wits with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gallies, Germanes, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or carethey they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus with our aduise of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africk, and crucified the Priests in the groues where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in stead of the liuing: yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue beene practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onely couered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Meneceus, as soone as he vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as he thought) vpon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was a battaile fought, wherein the Argives preuailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walls, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast downe, or (as Writers haue it) was stricken down by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Astacus behaued themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon, which was one of

of the seuen Princes: Parthenopaus being another of the seuen (who was said to haue beene so faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiarus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wounds, and that should haue made him immortall, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The host of the Argives being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiarus fledde: of whom Amphiarus is said to haue beene swallowed quicke into the earth, neere to the river Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight: being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carcasses, or drowned in the river: and his body neuer found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens, where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to bee buried: but caused Antigone, the onely daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to bee buried quicke, because shee had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Armie vnder the Conduct of Theseus, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to Sepulture: at which time Enadine the wife of Capaneus, threw her selfe into the funerals fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But little contented the sonnes of those Captaines which were slaine at Thebes, that any less reward should bee taken of their fathers death, then the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne yeere after hauing leuid forces, Aegialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tyden, Promachus of Parthenopaus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Meceius, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alcmaon the sonne of Amphiarus: with whom alio went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victorie if Alcmaon werethir Capitaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commanded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were incourted by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and slue Aegialeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driuen to flight (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcmaon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuayed themselves with their wives & children away from thence by night, and so began to wander vp and downe, til at length they built the Towne called Ecthea. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entering into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waste; shewbeit it is reported by some, that the Towne was sacked by Thersander, the sonne of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there reigne ouer them. That he sacked the Citie from vtter destruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Iephtha, and how the three hundred yeeres which he speaketh of, Ind. 11. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. 13. 20. 1. Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

After the death of Iair (neere about whose times these things hapned in Greece, & during whose government, & that of Thola, Israel liued in peace & in order) they were recalled again from the law & seruice of God, and became more wicked & idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal & Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen nations adoyning, and embraced the idolls of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites & Ammonites: with those of the Philistims. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistims. Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered upon upon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seeke Iephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base borne; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of diuillish hatred and reuenge, was content to leade the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they should establish him their Gouernour after victory. And when hee had disparted with Ammon for the Land, disproued Ammons rights, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same preuailling nothing, he began the warre; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not onely beate them out of the plaines, but forst them over the mountaines of Arabia, euen to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vaine vow which he made, to sacrifice the first liuing creature hee encountered, comming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and onely childe, who with all patience submitted her selfe, and onely desired two months time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion that shee was not offered, is more probable, which Borrbheus and others proue sufficiently.

Ind. 10. The persecution of the Ammonites lasted 18 yeeres, and ended in the World 1810. in which yeere Iephtha began. Ind. 11.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephtha's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most grievous slauery that euer Israel suffered, quarrelled with Iephtha, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Iephtha hereupon enforced to defend himselfe against their fury, in the encounter slew of them two and forty thousand, which so weakened the bodie of the Land, as the Philistines had an easie conquest of them all not long after: Iephtha, after he had iudged Israel sixe yeeres, died: to whom succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seuen yeeres: after him Elon was their Iudge tenne yeeres: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius findes not Elon, whom hee calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall be necessary vpon the occasion of Iephtha's account of the times Iud. 11. 28. (where he sayes that Israel had then possessed the East side of Jordan 300. yeeres) to speake somewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines & Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute betweene Iephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Iephtha heere challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeeres: Saint Paul giueth to the Judges, as it seemes, from the end of Iosua, to the last of Heli, 450. yeeres. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Aegypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeeres. To the first Beroaldus findeth Iephtha's 300. yeeres to be but 266. yeeres, to wit, 18. of Iosua, 40. of Othaniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Deborah, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or propoeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic ut dicat ammon ego possideo trecentessimum, ex quo nullus licet ea de re mouerit Israel: So hee speaketh (saith he) as numbering, that then it was about or wel-nigh the three hundred yeere, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codeman on the contrary findes more yeeres than Iephtha named by 65. to wit, 365, whereof 71. were spent in Israels captiuitie, at severall times, of which (as Codeman thinketh) Iephtha forbore to reapeate the whole summe or any great part, lest the Ammonites should haue iustly objected, that 71. of those yeeres, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeeres, it was enough for prescription, he committeth the rest.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeeres, besides the 71. yeeres of captiuitie or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. hee addeth also 28. yeeres more, and so maketh vp the summe of 365. These 28. yeeres hee findeth out thus: twenty yeeres hee giueth to the Seniors betweene Iosua and Othaniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighty yeeres to Iosua his gouernment, Codeman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. Melanchon 31. The truth is, that this addition of 28. yeeres is farre more doubtful than the other of 71. But though wee admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeeres of affliction (to wit, 34. yeeres of the 71.) if wee add them to the 266. yeeres of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, wee haue the iust number of 300. yeeres. Neither is it strange that Iephtha should leaue out more then halfe of these yeeres of affliction: seeing as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeeres, and say, that during these yeeres, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeeres remembered by Iephtha, to be 306. which odd yeeres, saith hee, Iephtha omitteth. But because the yeeres of euerie Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306: but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petraea, which fortie yeeres of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth, of 266. make indeede 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute betweene Iephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Aegypt, from Arnon unto Labar, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plaine that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Aegypt: but from the time that the Land was possessed. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram amon: Because Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephtha answereth also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Aracr & in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeeres: why did ye not then recover them in that space? For this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeeres: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possess it, it seemeth somewhat strained to mee; so, we doe not vnclearly reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Luther neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeeres hath reference, and isto take beginning from the first of Asphas narration: when hee makes a briefe repetition of Moses whole iourney: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Iudges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Aegypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeeres (as hee thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not onely the time in which Israel possessed Gilead, according to the Text and Iephtha's owne words: of which I leave the iudgement to others; to whom also I leave to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeeres, from the deducence out of Aegypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Aegypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Iephtha's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet haue bene signified. For first, touching Iephtha's three hundred yeeres of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof. So that Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel: and so Iephtha might say that they had possessed those Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed in this of S. Paul, Acts 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter (as I finde his opinion cited by Fanthius Krentzheimius, and Beza) for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeere of Heli, but 357. yeeres: and this he doth the better to approue the times from the egression out of Aegypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first King. 6. is said to be 480. yeeres.

Now so far as much as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeeres from the death of Iosua, to the last of Heli, and leaues but thirty yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words then afterward, being cleerely referred to the death or after the death of Iofua, as shall bee hereafter proued. But where Saint Luke rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeeres (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosia; for Triacosia; 400. yeeres, for 300. yeeres; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, hee takes his account from the death of Iofua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeeres: to wit: of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons yeeres) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder the Amorites, 111. Thereason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeeres, is because hee thinks that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in which the Philistims are said to haue oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres, and whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeeres, hee findes 20. yeeres to make vp Saint Pauls number, to haue bene spent after the death of Iofua by the Seniors, before the Captiuitie of Cafshan, or the election of Othniel: which 20. yeeres added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approue this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iofua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the daies of Iofua, and all the daies of the Elders that ouer-lined Iofua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. yeeres, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if heere also the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, betweene Iofua and Othniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Othniels 40. to beginne presently vpon the death of Iofua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeeres of affliction apart from the yeeres of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppression all of them a part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to bee the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seemes to enforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeeres, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeeres betweene the end of Iofua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors, betweene Iofua and Othniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if we adde the yeeres of the Judges, which are 339. wee haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to bee much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and reade with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeeres, is to beginne immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it bee receiued for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of fortie yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: And hee destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Judges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse hee speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse hee commeth vnto the acts of Iofua; which were, that hee destroyed seven Nations in the land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth: Then afterward hee gaue them Judges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so farre as my weake vnderstanding can pierce it. The only inconuenience of any waigh in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seemes irreconcilable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeede there were spent 450. yeeres betweene the end of Iofua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeeres betweene the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie

Codoman

Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeeres, 1. Reg. 6. 11. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Othniels gouernment; from whence if wee call the yeeres of the Judges, with the yeeres of seruitude (which summes according to his account, of which we haue already spoken, make 397. yeeres) and so to these yeeres adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall haue the iust summe of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (saith hee) that the annus egressionsis, 1. Reg. 6. 11. should be vnderstood egressionsis non incipientis sed finitis, the yeere of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Egypt, may well be vnderstood for the yeere after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to haue beene done in their going out of Egypt, as Psalm 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven backe, and Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus farre it seemes wee may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiissent, or ab exitu finito: for it Iunius, Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that heerein he doth well, why may not we also, to auoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, post quam exiissent?

The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Othniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared Iud. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the expedition may most conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephia, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to Iud. 18. this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that wee should suppose that Othniel liued all those 40. yeeres of rest, of which Iud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either he might haue bene dead, or at least, as Gideon did, hee might haue refused all loueignty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Othniels victorie) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in itselfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps be receiued as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul haue not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iustly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Lusib, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeere of Othniel? Or what other probability hath hee than his owne coniecture, to shew that Othniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after five and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Now concerning the rehearfall of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to haue bene, when Israel came out of Egypt; likewise say that King Edward the first was crowned when hee came out of the holie Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place eyther whence or whither they tend. But I thinke that hee can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a iourney by an accident, or faith by conuertyng the proposition, when Jordan was turning backe, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say, that King Edward at his arrival out of Palastina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may wee then beleue that enterprize performed so many yeeres after the diuision of the Land (which followed the conquest at the iournies end) should be said to haue beene at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not thinke it most strange, that the most notable account of time, seruing as the onely guide for certaine ages in sacred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning from from that illustrious deliuerance out of Agypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the yeere vpon that occasion changed; but should haue reference to the surprizing of a Town by sixe hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time giuen to it, or a time farre different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeere, because it best stood with his interpretation so to haue it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle Saint Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raise vp our Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein I see sheweth Christ to haue bene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well knowne and beleued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeeres consumed in the wilderness, whereof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40. yeeres. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the diuision of the Land vnto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeeres. Neither did he tend to tell them, that an hundred and eleuen yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Judges: for this had bene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is nota worke so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeeres is so expeditly and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehension of the vulgar, it is euident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeeres to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeeres were diuided betwene Saul and Samuel, yea, that farre the greater part of them were spent vnder the government of the Prophet, how soeuer they are heere included in the reigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the generall opinion, when it fauoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to helpe where the need is not ouer-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Berosus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeeres of seruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeeres ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict; but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadragesimo & quingenta annis; A. it were foure hundred and fifty yeeres. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs haue it be so indeed, and therefore disioynes the members to make the account euen. In so doing he dasheth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and successfully doth cast vp the yeeres from the departure out of Agypt, vnto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen saith to his owne interpretation of Saint Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde some new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine, and to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himselfe in those waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vige him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, That Othniel could not gouerne about 25. yeeres, because then was the taking of Laisb, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the

Daniel must needs haue taken Laisb at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Agypt, without excluding the yeeres of seruitude; And that the yeeres of seruitude must needs be included, for that otherwise hee himselfe should haue spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the decision of the iudicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our storie. To the time of Iephia are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prouisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Isean: from which time, if the Greekes had fixe yeeres to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this WWar, longa preparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy victory: for the Greekes consumed tenne yeeres in the attempt: and Troy, as it seemes, was entered, sacked and burnt in the third yeere of Iiabdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the sixt yeere of Habdon, Aneas arrived in Italie. Iiabdon in the eighth yeere of his rule, died, after hee had bene the Father of 40. sonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeeres of Israels oppression by the Philistims (of which Iud. 13. v. 1.) tooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Tair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Iephia, for not calling them to War ouer Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in seruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed: and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than against their owne brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being overthrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. yeeres must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Samson, and afterward: or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum betwene the death of Iiabdon, and the deliuerance of Israel by Samson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. 1.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue observed Historicall truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Iiabdon, Iudge of Israel, whom in the last place I haue mentioned) I rather choole here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineall descent of their Princes, than to breake the story into pieces by rehearsing a-part in diuers yeeres, the diuersitie of occurrences.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanius were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reinecius thinks) tooke from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it rests vpon the authority of Virgil, who saith thus:

*Creta Iouis magni medio iacet insula ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostra.*

Aristid. 3.

Centum

*Centum Vrbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde Pater (si rite audita recorder)
Teucrus Rhæteus primum est aduētus adoras:
Optauitque locum regno. Nondum illum & arces Pergameæ sterant: habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiæ ara, Idæumq; nemus.*

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lie:
Where Ioue was borne, thence is our progenie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhætean shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought
In lowest vales. Hence Cybelis rites were bought:
Hence Corybantiæ Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Teucer first gaue name to that Countrie, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus:

*Ille locus, Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atq; ubera gleba,
OEnotrij coluere viros, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ductis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propria sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Iasiq; Pater, genus à quo Principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Gracians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
OEnotrians held it; now the later progenie
Giues it their Capitaines name, and calls it Italie;
This feate belongs to vs, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our stocke, Iasius.

*Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Auruncos ita ferre senes, hic ortus ut agria
Dardanus Idæas Phrygia penetrauit ad urbes, Threiciamq; Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryis Tyrrenia ab sede profectum, Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cæli Accipit, &c.*

Some old Auruncans, I remember well, (Though time haue made the fame obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leauing Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Coryis did faile to Samothrace;
But now inthroned he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starrie skie.

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucris, and Thracæ, are deriued from Troas or Thraci the son of Iaphet: and that the Dardaniæ, Mysiæ, & Ascaniæ, mixt with the Troians, were were Germane Nations, descended from Asfkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and Ruer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name: That Asfkenaz gaue name to those places and people, it is not vnlikely: neither is it vnlikely, that the Ascanij, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Troas, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Italianus makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shew'd) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrie, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gaue his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Iupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom he bare Iasius. Annius out of his Herodotus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he giues the addition of Coritus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iasius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betwene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscuritie of the historie giues leaue to Annius of saying what he list. I that loue not to vse such libertie, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Iupiter, it must haue bene of some elder Iupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often bene said) there were many Iupiters, and many of almost euery name of the Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my selfe with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set downe the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus giues, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Atlas

Many by valour haue deseru'd renowne
 Ere Agamemnon : yet lye all opprest
 Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vnknowne :
 For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilseth these writers haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble vnderakers : they haue both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories ; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose workes are both profit and delight : yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise ; but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much dilige[n]ce of Authors, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking armes : but how he was hereunto emboldned it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen : and strength of both sides for the warre.

Erodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre ; saying, That whereas the Phenicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa, whom they brought out of Phenicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirmes) was emboldened to doe the like ; not fearing such reuenge as ensued. But all this narration seemes frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phenicians ? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, plead any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phenicians ? Thucydides a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie, maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not vsed at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy ; and that the Greekes themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreasonable to thinke, that they should haue sought reuenge vpon all Nations, as barbarous, for the iniurie received by one : or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world ; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue bene true. For Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruel man, seeing his owne sonne Teucer durst not come in his sight after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Aias (which Teucer could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom she had borne children which were to succede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione : but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greekes, as Herodotus discouerseth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them ; and hauing stolen them, either to sell them away in some farre Countrey, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Theseus, and Pirithous attempt Proserpine, and so did Theseus (long before Paris) rauish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neere vnto the Sea, for feare of pyracie, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull then merchandise : wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if shee were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, he gaue free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping ; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands : he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more then any other of the Greece Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus ; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise ; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts : but the vessels were not great : for it was not then the manner to build ships with deckes, onely they vsed (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meete for robbing on the Sea, the least of which carried fittie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Soldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian army consisted of 100000. men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece : and the greatnesse of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole yeeres did stand out against such forces : yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads ; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazones also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke, out of Aethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenas being detained in Egypt ; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Herefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to triall of armes, if things might be compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Vlysses Embassadors to Troy ; who demanded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Troians made hereunto it is vn certaine. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with H. Iena, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuaty. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them : dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demanding Helen had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeede she had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysseys, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before hee returned home to Spacia ; which voyage it were not easily beleued, that he made for pleasure : and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue bene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediately vpon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Hauen in the Greekes seas : whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Nauigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Aegyptian Priests; which is, that if Helen had bene at Troy, it had bene vnter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Hektor was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had bene rauished by Thesus the almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had bene rauished by Thesus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to haue bene twins) who sailed with the Argonautes, having Telamon the father of Aias in their companie before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon began Aias, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so, that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy; at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue bene a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines and all the Hoste with many troublesome answers and diuinations. For he would haue *Agamemnon*s daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the yong Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddess was contented with a Hind, is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the diucl, which is awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some tall impediments were removed: and that till ten yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greekes proceeded in their enterprise, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phenix; Aias and Tenec, the sonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sonnes Antilocheus, and Thrasymedes; Phylis, Amphimachus the sonne of Petrus, Captaine of the Athenians; Diomedes the sonne of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes, Acaliphus, and Ialmenus the sonnes of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonautes; Philoctetes also the sonne of Pam, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the Citie could not be taken; Aias the sonne of Oileus, Peneleus, Thobas, Eumelus, Tysandrus, Euripilus, Alkimas, Sibeneus, Tlepolemus the sonne of Hercules; Podilyrius and Atachon, the sonnes of Acaliphus; Epeus, who is said to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatened death to him that landed first.

Of the Aids of the Grecians at the siege.

Here, and many other of lesse note, arriuing at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the war would be more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilaus, whom Hektor slew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: saue onely that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incampe themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the finallesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessities for such an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherronesse: other to rob vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the war protracted nine whole yeeres, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the towne receive little losse by them, hauing equall numbers to maintaine the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ouid saith, that from the first yeere, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heracles commendes as very credible, the report of Herodotus; That the Greekes did not lye before Troy the first nine yeeres: but onely did beate vp and downe the seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies Country, did blocke vp the towne, vnto which they returned not, vntill the fatal time drew neere when it should be subuerbed.

This is confirmed by the enquire which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere, for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is Homer lieth, like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue bene supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeeres together. Betwene these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greekes remained in the Campe before Troy, whilest the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the other, that the whole armie did spend the time in wasting the sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many townes and Ilands wasted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had bene to be performed before the Citie. Howsoeuer it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arose among the Greekes: which Homer saith that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ransom: but Heracles interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raised pestilent fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the campe was ouer-pestered with those, who had bene abroad, and now were lodged all close together: hauing also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention betwene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as General, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Aias, Phylis, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothsaye Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father *Apollo*s Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoyle, but would either take that which had bene given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aias, or to Phylis. Hereupon Achilles desired him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captaines. But the Greekes encouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troups.

The Troians were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries hauing sent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer;) or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also as we may well guesse incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes, when they wasted the Countries adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hektor issued out of the towne, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hektor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other sonnes of Priamus; Aeneas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaukus, Asius, and the sonnes of Pantus, besides Rhesus, who was slaine the first night of his arriuall. Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Betwene these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon the plaine: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hektor brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Aias, the sonne of Telamon with his brother Tenec, were in a manner the onely men of note that remained vnwounded, made head against Hektor, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troups, relieuing the wearie Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Phylis, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with helpe of Patroclus repelled repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres, having slaine a man, to strip him and hale away his body, not restoring it without ranfome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the successe of their Capitaines; who rode not upon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three of horses, which were guided by some trustie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Capitaines, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where neede required, threw first their Iaulcins, and then alighting fought on foot, with swords and battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of foot-men, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their armes defence were helmets, breast-plates, bootes of brasse or other metall, and shields commonly of leather plated ouer. The offensive were swords and battel-axes at hand, and stones, arrowes or darts when they fought at any distance. The vse of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keepe them from wearinesse, whereto the leaders were much subiect, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest were heauiest: also that from them they might throw their Iaulcins downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their Tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; euery man (speaking of the chiefes) carried his owne compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Capitaine whom he had slaine, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such meanes gotten foule to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe vnto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behaue himselfe, that he did not onely put the Troians to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleueed) he chased three times about the wals of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians, were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Sindus, as he must haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians perceiving Hector in such an extremitie, would haue borne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes fouer) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead body, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leathernethongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his cruelty and courtoisnesse were not long vnuenged; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes, in the Scæan gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing slaine so many of her brethren, and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfe-same rate that Hector's was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proofe-giuen of her valour, was slaine by Pyrhus the sonne of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Booke of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the reason of Aeneas and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame

(which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entering by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horse. It may well be that with some wooden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romanes in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or elsedid the wals vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden horse, it had beene a desperate aduenture, and seeming to no purpose. For either the Troians might haue perceived the decceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon: for they might haue left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was vnlkely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing in into the towne, and brake downe their wals vpon the sudden to doe it:;) by which means they who were shut into it, must haue perished, for hunger, if they had not by sitting forth vnreasonably discovered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needelesse, considering that without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armeie, so that the surprizing of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

Iohn Baptista Gramay in his History of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith, that the Greekes did both batter the wals with a wooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townefmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dyctis must proue, which whether we now haue the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the common report: had it not beene that either those bookes were euident those times thought frivoulous, or else contained no such repugnancie to the other authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to haue bene about 600000. on the Troian side, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report merely fabulous; for as much as the whole fleet of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as he could, to be somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported ouer the Greece seas, not much about 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of mento extoll the deedes of their Antients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Capitaines of the Greekes that serued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romanes descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mucellus the sonne of Petrus had shewed, in marshalling the Grecians army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had beene a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admirallie of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanity possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which haue striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But these Nations, which indeede, or in most probability came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy, and from them the Romanes, brought into that Countrey by Aeneas: the Epirotians first seated in Padus, and the Countrey adioyning by Antenor: the Chalcians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hollanians addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did resemble such of the Troians as were left, and reigned ouer them about Eppus.

§. V I.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

O Concerning the Greekes, they tasted as much misery as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrivall: others were debarred from the Sovereignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to have bene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long waite, was of little force to repel iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder severall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising from the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have fell saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole fleet was fore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus, and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgill tels, were driven soone after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Peisilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his wife and by the adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandering long vpon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Vlysses, after ten yeeres, having lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recovering the mastery of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and saile to seek out new habitations.

Alex the sonne of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Damius, who was Lord of the Tapyres in Apulia, some of the Locrians were driven into Asprike, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driven to erect vpon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose husbands had bene at the waite of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes suffered misery, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the overthrow of which Citie, as hath bene said, happened in the time of Habdon Iudge of Israel, whom Samson after a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.
Of Samson.

2970.

HE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not neede to make any repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that storie. First, that the Angell of God forbade the wife of Manash the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to cate any vncleane meate, after shee was conceiued with childe; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, or at least will not beleue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinke, nor meates, how strong or vncleane soeuer, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinke farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Manash would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that profess diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Diuels who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deccitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas euerit; Whom no force could ouermaster, Voluptuosa seque ouerturba.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slain 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in harvest time, and giuen them a great overthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Juda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vling these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers over vs, &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gaue them an other overthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Ass.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca, Patientia sepe lesa virtutis in furorem, Patience often wounded is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Arke taken, and of Dagons fall, and the sending back of the Arke.

THE storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose finnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the sword of the Philistims; 40 of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 3000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slain, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abisue the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocci the fifth, Ozi the sonne of Bocci the sixth, and then Elias, Iosephus and Lyranus out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceiued. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimias and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsooke the habitation of Shilo: euen the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us goe to the Seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; nor that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those reuelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel iudged were Maspa or Mitspa, seated on a hill in Benjamin neere Iuda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which wee haue spoken elsewhere.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mitspa in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie and marched towards to the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia.) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophesie of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall he thunder upon them, &c. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy successe, obtained by the miraculous hand of God; which Josephus called, Lapidem fidei: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitee and advantage of the victory, the Israelites recouered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backes, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from diuers parts at once; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanites toward the North and East, and the Iudæans to the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turnes, as hath beene elsewhere said.

CHAP. XVI.

OF SAVL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

BUT when age now began to ouer-take Samuel, and that he was not able to vnder-goe the burthen of so carefull a government, he put off from himselfe the waight of the affaires on his sonnes, Ioel and Abijah, who iudged the people at Beerseba, a Citie the very utmost towards the South of Iudæa. And as the place was inconuenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse remoued from the iustice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of couetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it dieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine; to recouer which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and Iudgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be iudged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeelde fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approued his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, heeued his best arguments to dehont them: which when he perceived to be ouer-feeble, he deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is so still by free consents of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first hee makes them know, that the King will vict their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariottes, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grieuous, but by the Vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subiects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto breed and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened, Hee will take your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Oliue trees; and give them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues dayly occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth heere vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subiects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Iudges to Kings; and after hee had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: hee commaundeth that the Kings which were to reigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that hee may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, hee and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is iust and right shall thou follow, that thou mayest liue. Now if it be not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eat out of a another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take away any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes: and a gaine, This shall be the manner of the King that shall reigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power feared from pietie, (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hercof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Na-both both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should bee iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboths composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money which he refused: yet because hee was filly accused, and vniuilly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, even as Dauid testifieth of himselfe: Possisti me in iustitia gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: Simu-lata equitas non est equitas: sed dupliciter peccatum in quo est iniquitas et simulatio: Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one, nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all: being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Onely this much I will say, that if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authority, euen the best Kings of Iuda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes; but that they did what belier they pleased in

the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Saulon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not onely fore-told by Moses in Deteronomie, but perceived by Jacob in this Scripture: The Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equall the Starres in heauen, but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the patterne of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other governments, hath bene by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not need to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges euery man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had; what outrageous slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeeres: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrey. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Iordan; the Philistines the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this means they fought to be cleared from the finnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the persuasions and threats which Samuel vsed; insisting vpon this point, that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, hee sent query man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, hee forbore the election of a King, till such times as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom he commanded Samuel to appoint. So Samuel went vnto Ramath Saphim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also hauing wandered diuers daies to seeke his fathers asses, at length by the aduice of his seruant trauelled towards Ramath, to finde a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages, and persons) to direct Saul, who sought an Ass, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Abner, while he fed the sheepe of Iezro; and after to make choyce of David the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts; and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Jacob were taken from casting their bets, to become fishers of men, and conquered with the titles of Apostles, a dignitie that did not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euerslasting in Gods cheralding Kingdome.

When Samuel was entered into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom hee expected, and stayed his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had fore-told him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, about all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods Gods graces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should encounter him by Rahels Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne: that he should then meet three other men in the plaine of Zabor; then a company of Prophets: and that hee should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophetic with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, & after them Gad, Nathan, Ahiah, Elisha, Elisha, Ishai, Jeremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrant, praeterita, praesentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of 1. Cor. 14. 14. who enriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Mizpah Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betwene him and Samuel: for either hee thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpah, the general opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinks by the answer of Primo and Thumim: that is, by the answer of the Priests, wearing that myserie vpon his brest when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not onely much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others haue recorded that the Romanes, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the members diuers sorts of lots, vsed by the Romanes, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds or honours; and in things to bee vnder-taken: the two first kindes were called diuiniorie; the third, diuinary; and vnto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kindes howsoever they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the lap, But the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus confests it, and as it may bee gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when hee acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and hee was taller then all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that hee was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoide sedition,ooke no notice.

§. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victory.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee received knowledge that Nabab King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Iabes Gilead: which Nation since the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephia, neuer durst attempt anie thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossessed them of; which they made the ground of their inuasion in Iephia's time, yet they neuer perfwaded themselves of more aduantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistines had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so euen to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor use after his Conquest in India: Dionysius in Sicilie: and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But the Israelites had weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Canaan, for ouer Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed, and their present necessity ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites excelled in casting stones in slings; and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour Dauid against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were to be armed with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that Dauid himselfe slew the Gyaunt Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Elquire onely, scaled a mountaine, wherco a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may be gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though he were discouered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of derision called vp by his enemies: yet he so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and iaculosity, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and lew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded them in the mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victory ouer them. Heere was that prophetic in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and twof them ten thousand.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the euenng, yet his sonne Jonathan being infebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seemed to haue reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vnderooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobab, against all which he preuailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiving the commandment of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, waisting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert belonging to the Amalekites, from Hauilah towards Tigra vnto Shur, which bordereth Aegypt; in which warre he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Aegypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not onely spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoyle of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therefor did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there bene no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not bee ignorant how severely it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all excusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from vnder heauen. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouer-wearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, and his Nation about 400. yeeres afterwarde, and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the

the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shalt thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had bene by many bookelesse intercesse perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilead, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, untill the day of his death.

6. V.

Of the occurrents betwene the reuelion of Saul and his death.

Now while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to chioose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Isba: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might auoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom, hee sought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life; then doe these men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, where-with God hath enriched the mind of man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Isba, Samuel by God directed, made chioice of Dauid, the yongest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beheldeth the heart. He also refusing the other sixe brethren, made chioice of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flocke, for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neyther was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloody munde he continued till he died, ouercome in battell by the Philistims.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still & forborne to giue impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might be repayed with aduantage, if euer opportunity should serue their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike prouisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselves equall, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part bene agreeable to their own wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battel, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay betweene their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had beene so founded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heauen were to bee feared. Goliath of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, vnderooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as ouercome in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to Dauid, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe

to encounter the great strength of Goliath, vntill Dauid (sent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith he ouerthrew that haughtie Gyaunt, and after with his owne sword shooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should haue yielded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the covenent on their owne side propounded, fled without stay, and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that cyther any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But Dauid, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grieuous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimelech kedde Dauid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest taken from Goliath; Saul not onely by his wicked Edomite Dag murdered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Oxe and Asse, and Sheepe. And hee that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an Asse, enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattel, contrarie to the Commandement and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of Israel. Yea hee would haue slaine his owne sonne Jonathan, for pitying and pleading Dauids innocence, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of crueitie breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying Dauid his daughter, whom he had given her; also in that when Dauid had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet hee sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impietie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Deuill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neere and faithful seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung out the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Liberstone their carcases thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel 40. yeeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which Dauid after ward obtained: for hee had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as lined with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues: vpon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidae, entering Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second yeere of Samuel, according to Ensebius, was Dauid borne: after Codoman later, and in the ninth yeere: after Bunting in the tenth. For Dauid, faith he, was thirty yeeres old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that hee was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeeres, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the 11. yeere of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus began his reigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State one and thirty yeeres. Thereafter who place before him Latinus Sylvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from from Aeneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus late in the Throne of Affyria, being the one and thirtieth King, he ruled that Empire fortie yeeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidae, who then led and commanded the Nation, posselt a great part thereof 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Erastus. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pithotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet euery seuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had reigned ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, cyther because the names of his Parents, had in the Greek tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrrha. Deucalion & his wife Pyrrrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrrha the Queene. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Aeolus: of Dorus and Aeolus, the Dores and Aolians had name. The Aeoles inhabited Boeotia. The Dores haue first inhabited sundrie parts of Thessalie, did afterward leave themselves about Par-nassus, and finally became Lords of the Countreies about Lacedaemon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for haue diuerted from them to his owne city some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the daughter of King Erichon, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two, Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponnesus: and leaving himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) hee afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie, recovered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, hee planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Aegialos, or Aegialia: In which Countrie Solimus then reigning, thought it safer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his Wiues name in Aegialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land denomination. But in after times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and ouercomming the Achaens, posselt Laconia, and all those parts which the Achei had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achei driuen to seeke a new seate, came vnto the Iones desiring to inhabit Aegialia with them, and alleading in vaine, that Ion and Achaeus had bene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenus, the sonne of Orestes in that Warre.

Thus were the Iones driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remooue into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vnusuall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Asia hath bene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the descent of the Heraclidae into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidae were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father

Hercules many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue bene true, others perhaps must be allegorically vnderstood. But the most approved Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed these 12 great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hare: The fourth was the taking of a wilde Borealine, which haunted moune Erymanthus in Arcadie: The fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the Riuer Alpheus into it: The sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: The seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eight was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace led with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Cerions Beeces from Gades, the golden Apples of the Heesperides, and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be heere set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Confiance, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his traualles to be the twelue signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other Townes, being afflicted by such as cyther admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that hee slew many Theeues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His traualis through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Labyens. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indeuours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persecuted by the King Eurythens. This Eurythens was sonne of Sthenelus, and grand-child of Perseus; hee reigned in Mycena, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks vpon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madnes hee had committed vpon his owne children; but as others say, because he was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore theretoe who commend Eurythens for employing the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great ialousie by Eurythens because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein he was employed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wives and Concubines about threescore children. These children Eurythens would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled vnto Cegus King of Thracina, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurythens) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gaue them entertainment, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountered Eurythens, Iolaus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captain of the Heracleide. It is said of him, that being dead, hee obtained leave of Pluto to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurythens: whom when he had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to mee, that whereas he had ledde Colonies into Sicilie, and abode there a long time forgotten: hee came againe into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurythens was slaine, they tooke Atrius the sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mighty, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heracleide marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to auoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echeneus King of the Tegente a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atrius; with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enioy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heracleide should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heracleide compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Aristodemus (as the best authoritie doth shew, though some haue said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Doris, whom whom they planted in that country; as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achaes, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurythens thre generations.

§. VII.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, thus happened about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Magnes, descended (as Putholimus imagineth) of Berosus his Anamant, who gaue name to that people. But this Emilius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue bene long after these times, rightly framing his Ara according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment of temporibus, and makes Ara according to this name to haue flourished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, spring the diuersitie of opinions, both of the time and of the natiue Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Euclitius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Iudea, and Numa of Rome. He was called Nesleogenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blinde men follow a guide, which signification among others is in the verbe homo: for this Homer in his later time was blinde. Clement Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also Annius Gellius, and Tatianus Affrius in his Oracion ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. yeeres before the Consulship of Martinus Viminus: which Arcator catcheth vp in the worlds yeere 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260 yeeres: and about 250 yeeres before the building of Rome, making him to haue flourished about the time of Iehosaphat King of Iuda. But Clement Alexandrinus and Tatianus about named, mention authors that make him much ancients. The difference of which authors in this point is not vnworthy the readers consideration, that by this one instance he may guesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diuersitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarians (as Clement Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 80. yeeres after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heracleide returned into Peloponnesus: and Eratosthenes after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the armie of Greece failed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Agas, who began to reigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. yeeres after Rome was built) and Sophinus saith, that he was 90. yeeres before the first Olympiad: which hee seeks to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander; Phylarchus placeeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirms that he liued while Agesslaw gouerned Lacedaemon; and that Lycurgus in his young yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes entred pise against the Gracians: which Berosus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Embsinus seemes to make him to haue bene about the time of Iou King of Iuda, 124. yeeres before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie, he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of Dauid, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Affrius he citheth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, he reckoneth many other Greece writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Pheonius, Aristeus, Orpheus, Musæus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Annius Gellius reports that Philostratus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaues it vncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they liued together some certaine yeeres, where- in he confirms himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Hesiod in Illicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while the Siligi reigned in Alba, about 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. Enthymerus findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acacius the sonne of Pelops, King of Theſſaly. For my ſelfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the Reader with theſe opinions, but onely to ſhew the vncertainty and diſagreement of Hiſtorians, as well in this particular, as in all other queſtions and diſpute of time. For the curioſitie of this manſage is no leſſe ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menia, as perhaps containing ſome great myſticke. In diſſiſion whereof Lucian ſaining himſelfe to haue bene in hell, and to haue ſpoken with Homer, there asked him the cauſe why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that ſort, becauſe it came in his head ſo to doe.

It ſeemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobins, Senecires, ruled Aegypt at this time; for Tanepher ſobris was his ſucceſſour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

Euseb. C. 11. in Chron.

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Dauids time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazons with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylanius then ruling in Italia. And beſides the ouertlow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. yeeres before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reaſon of thoſe Northern Nations: but there ſprung vp ſomewhat neerely together, ſix Kingdomes into greatneſſe not before erected. In Italia, that of the Latins in the South part of Greece, thoſe of Lacedamon, Corinth, and the Achaes. In Arabia, Syria, Seba, and Damaſcus, the Adams made themſelues Princes, of which there were ten Kinges, which began and ended with the Kinges of Iſrael. In effect: and ſomewhat before theſe the State of the Iſraelites hauing now altered the forme of Government, began to ſtouriſh vnder Kinges, of which Dauid, a few yeeres, became maſter of all thoſe neighbouring Nations who by interchange of times had ſubjected the Judeans, corrupted their religion; and held them vnder in a moſt abiect and grieuous ſlauiery; to wit, the Edumians, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Iturians, and the reſt of the Arabians, with the Philiftims, Iſobites, Gethurites, Machathites; all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Dauid.

§. I.

Of Dauids eſtate in the time of Saul.

THE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely designed King, and liuing as a priuate man, expected the Empire, were very many. The firſt perſonall act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby he became knowne to Saul, and ſo highly affected of Jonathan the ſonne of Saul, that he loued him as his owne ſoule: In ſo much as when Saul fought to perſwade his ſon, that Dauid would aſſuredly be the ruine of his houſe, and eſtate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cauſe, Jonathan could neuer be perſwaded, neuer forſt, nor euer wearied from the care of Dauids life, & well doing. It was not long after this ſignall act of Dauid, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though he were becomeas his houſhold ſervant, and his Eſquire, or armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill ſpirit, was aduiſed to procure ſome cunning Muſician to play before him vpon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde eaſe; which came to paſſe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpoſe, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant ſoone waxed wearie of his good affection, and fought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This paſſion firſt brake forth in the middeſt of his raiuing ſit, at which time he threw a ſpeare at Dauid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him eaſe.

Conſ. 12. C. 14.

Conſortinus remembreth one Aſclepius a Phyſician, who practiſed the curing of the Frenzie; by the like Muſicke: and tempered thereby thoſe diſeaſes which grew from paſſion. That Pythagoras did alſo the like by ſuch a kinde of harmonic, Seneca in his third booke of anger witneſſeth. But the madneſſe of Saul came from the cauſe of cauſes, and and was thereby incurable, howſoeuer it ſometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that Muſicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Muſician than to the King.

Saul hauing failed in ſuch open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Command ouer 1000. ſouldiers, to confront the Philiftims withall. For hee durſt not truſt him as before, about his perſon, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, he promiſed him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, he gaue to Dauid his yonger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to preſent him with an hundred foreskins of the Philiftims: hoping rather (in reſpect of the valour of that Nation), that the Philiftims would take Dauids head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories began new feares and iealouſies in Saul, he practiſed with Jonathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purpoſes were ſtill fruſtrated. After all this he fought to murder him in his owne houſe, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid fought Samuel at Ramah, and being purſued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philiftim, Prince of Geth: where to obſcure himſelfe, he was fore to counterſeit both ſimplicitee and diſtraction. But being ill aſſured among the Philiftims, he couered himſelfe in the Caſe of Adullam: and after conuincing ſuch of his kinſfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himſelfe in the deſerts of Ziph, Maon and the hills of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and ſpared his life: as he did a ſecond time in the deſert of Ziph, after his paſſage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis the ſecond time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his maſter Saul was knowne to proſecute him.

Inſin in Phil.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simcon, pretending to invade Iudaea: but he bent his forces another way and ſtrooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Iſrael, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis ſuppoſing that Dauid had drawne blood of his owne Nation, thought himſelfe aſſured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Iſrael, ſummoned Dauid to aſſiſt him, who diſſembling his intent, ſeemeth very willing thereto. But the reſt of the Philiftim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his diſpoſition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himſelfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wiues with the wiues and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Here vpon his fellowes murined, but God gaue him comfort, and aſſurance to recover all againe: which he did.

This arme of the Philiftims commanded by Achis, encountered Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three ſonnes were ſlaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the ſame Nation, who aſſured (though falſly) that himſelfe at Sauls requeſt had ſlaine him. Dauid, becauſe he had accuſed himſelfe, made no ſcruple to cauſe him to be ſlaine at the inſtant: and the ſooner, becauſe the probabilities gaue ſtrong euidence withall. Otherwiſe it followeth not that euery man ought to be beleeued of himſelfe to his owne preiudice. For it is held in the law; Confefſio reorum non habenda eſt pro explorato crimine, niſi approbatio alia inſtruit religionem cognoſcentis. The priſoners conſeſſion muſt not be taken for an euidence of the crime, vntleſſe ſome other prooffe informe the conſcience of the Iudge. For a man may conſeſſe thoſe things of himſelfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to be impoſſible. But becauſe it is otherwiſe determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi conſeſſus, & in cap. de penis l. qui conſentiam, therefore doth the Gloſſe reconcile theſe two places in this ſort: Si quis in iudicio ſponte de ſiſſo conſeſſatur, & poſtea manet in conſeſſione, id eſt ſuſa. If any man in iudgement doe conſeſſe of himſelfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perſeuere in his conſeſſion, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul is not improbable, for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befall him, being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtirre vp ſorrow, and moue compaſſion in the heart of Dauid.

The victory which the Philiftims had gotten was ſo great, that ſome townes of the Iſraelites, euen beyond the riuer of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemy, who tooke poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeeme ſtrange, that a Nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiftims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the Conqueſt entire.

Moſt

Molt like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betwene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, left by so doing they should enforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vniited.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Dauids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to aduance Isboseth (or Ishbosh, according to Iosephus) though he had no right to the Kingdom of Israel: for Mephioseth the first son of Ionathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, Dauid made a defensive warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entered the border of Iuda; at which time he sent Isab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountered each other the neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betwene the Lacedemonians and the Argues, remembered by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnlaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatij and Curiatij for the Romans and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistim made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valor was so equal, as there suruiued not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staid not here: for the army of Iuda prest Abner in groffe, and brake him. Three hundred and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twenty of Iuda: whereof Asabel the brother of Isab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounded him to death, with the stroke of his speare. For though Asabel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde Ree, and as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue murthered Abner (who, as Asabel perswaded himselfe, had by being ouerthrowne and flying away lost his courage; yet here it fell out true, That the race is not to the swift.

Vers. 10.

That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, we finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew ialousie betwene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

Of the death of Abner slaine by Isab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

2 Sam. 3. 27.

2 Sam. 3. 39.

Vers. 45.

A*Abner*, reconciled to Dauid, was murthered by Isab; for Isab could not endure a companion in Dauids fauour, and in the commandment of his forces, by which he was growne so powerfull, as Dauid forbore to call him to account; for thus much he confest of himselfe: I am this day weake, and these men of the houses of Zeruah be too hard for me. In this sort Dauid complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Isab, he followed him with this publike imprecation; Let the bloud fall on the head of Isab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subiect to eileers, to the leprosie, to Lameness, to the sword, and to pouertie, &c. For could anything haue wish't to the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Isab might greatly haue indangered Dauids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore Dauid openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceiued him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings himselfe was faine to giue them great respect, as hath bene already shewed more at large. This office Isab held in the armie of Iuda, and thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Dauid in person, and had bene partaker of all his aduersitie; wherefore he did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. In dedee he was by nature so ialous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward slew Asabel his owne kinsman and the Kings, vpon the same quartrell, taking it in high disdain to see him joynt with himselfe as captain of the hoste of Iuda, much lesse could he brooke a superiour, and such 2 one as had slaine his brother, and bene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoeuer Isab did hate or despise Abner, Dauid esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might see to haue perished, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as 2 Sam. 3. a man fall'n before wicked men, so (saide he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyed in warres, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all vnder the Sunne are subiect to worldly miseries and misaduentures. Howsoeuer Isboseth meant to haue dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he depaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were possit with great feare: in so much as two of Isboseths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Isboseth, and presenting his head to Dauid, receiued the same reward that the Amalekites lately did, for pretending to haue slaine Saul. Isboseth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to Dauid at Hebron, where he was the third and last time annointed by generall consent.

§. IIII.

Of the flourishing time of Dauids Kingdome, the taking of Ierusalem, with two ouerthrowes giuen to the Philistines, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of Dauid.

When Dauid was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was vpon the Iebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their wals with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which Dauid loone after entered: all their other forces notwithstanding. For hauing mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) he became Lord of Ierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Iosua, and after them almost 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebusites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac, and Isaac: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, Dauid ought not to molest them. But for my selfe I take it with Iosephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorn of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against all the children of Israel, Iosua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against Dauid.

When he had now possit himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and receiued congratulatory Embassadors and presents from Hiram King of Tyre; he entertained diuers other concubines and married moe wiues, by whom he had ten sons in Ierusalem, and by his former wiues he had fixe in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philistines hearing that Dauid was now annointed King, as wel of Iuda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warme in his feat. And being encountered by Dauid at two seuerall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giantes, they were at both times ouerthrowne. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then Dauid assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conuict the Arke of God from the house house of Abinadab in Gibea, to the Citie of David, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Pezrah the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musike, dances, and all signes of ioyfullnesse, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne, That he was uncovered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that he forgot his regall dignity both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and streetes: not that she disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision, but rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was deliuered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceiued that the sonne of Israhel had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wiues and concubines embraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in those despitefull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

^{1 Chron. c. v. 3.} This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; hauing threatened, not in vaine, that he would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars, in which David had made were iust, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceiue themselves, who thinke by bloodshed and terrour of their warres, to make themselves in greatnesse like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Saviour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the eternall lasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The ouerthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

^{2 Sam. vi. 1.} Sooner after this David ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in haste. For it is written, Acceptit frantum Amgaru' & manu Philisthorum; which place our English Genea converts in these words, And David tooke the bride of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense; for by that bride of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Genea hath it in the marginales note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cesarea, set on the frontier of Palesina at the entrance into Judaea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereto their retreat in all their inuasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amma, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and Chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

^{Romans in 8. c. of the second of Sam.}

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities and villages of that kinde, but infort them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

^{2 Sam. 13.}

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betweene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. sheekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David and slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Counsellors and Captaines of David (lest the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himselfe in any battaile. The second and third encounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Gefar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie he sought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

The Rabbines saie that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which liued vnder his protection in Saul's time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin always enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seeke the peace or prosperity of the Moabites, which David well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobab, the region of Adadezer the sonne of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which David made vpon the Syrians.

¹⁰ It is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinks that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu oppress by Hadadezer, ouerthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most receiued opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in so faire better case to haue proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his backe, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Again, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plaines of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those vninhabited places, by which he was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we finde that David returned to Ierusalem, after he had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria Damascena, and of Danafer, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrowne by the Israelites, fearing his owne estate, and the losse of his owne country which adioyned to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too soone for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Danafer, Iosephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: hauing also sacked the adioyning cities of Betab, and Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomee calleth Betab, Tauaba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tobu or Thoi whose country of Hamath ioyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the Holy Land the reader may perceiue) sent his sonne Ioram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had ware with Adadezer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, siluer, and brasse; all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the

the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated vnto God at his returne. In nin translated the words (chrycos aureos) by ymbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Kobab made shields of brasie in place of these of Adadazer, at such times Shichab the Aegyptian sackt the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadazer were golden shields.

This done, David sent Embassadors to Hannan King of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had bene relieved by Nabal, the father of Hannan. But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-iculous of his estate, vsed Dauids messengers to so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre vpon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and of his confederates, to wit, of the vassalles of Adadazer twentie thousand, and of Maachab the fourth part of Ysraels re- chab and Ishtob thirtene thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of filuer) yet all these great armies together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Isab and his brother Abisai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramies fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the walles, the other in their desarts adioyning, till Isab was returned to Hierusalem.

Adadazer hearing that Isab had dismissed his armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israhel, and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmirent, not yet entered into Arribia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Hierusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humbly) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the far-st off iourney that euer hee had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one dayes iourney from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had he two safe retreates, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter betweene David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers footmen, and so Iunius conuerts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israhel consisting of fooremen, could hardly haue slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbered at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth, in which number, as I conceiue, all the Souldiers that serued in them with the conductors are included: so as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre against David, before hee forced them to tribute, 100000. foote-men, besides all their horsemen and waggons, and besides all those that Isab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adids in following ages gathered strength againe, and assisted the Kings of Indu often: but the Kings of Israhel they impowerrified euen to the last end of that State.

David hauing now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He sent out Isab the Lieutenant of his armies to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israhelites mastered and posselt. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Hierusalem, following the warre of Vriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie, and ready to be entered: yet Isab in honour of David forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his matters arrual. To the people he vsed extreme rigour (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them he tare with har-rowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kilns, in which he baked tile and bricke.

§. VII.

Of Dauids troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

¶ Vras victory begetteth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commandements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enemy (against whom he was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) he began to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not only satisfied to take Vriahs wife from him, and to vse her by stealth: but he imbrodered his adultery with Vriahs slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant Isab to Marshall him in the front or point of those Israhelites, which gaue an assault vpon the suburbs of Rabbah, when there was not as yet any possibility of preuailing. And, that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best seruants and Souldiers should perish together with Vriah, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his trodden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as hee hoped) gaue him an alter-haruest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the winnells of Dauids owne mouth against him, as David himselfe did against the Amalekites, which pretended to haue slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne errour, in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: Hee then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods iustice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house, &c. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine Vriah with thy hand, &c. Soone after this David lost the childre of adultery which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Thamar, by the aduise of his Cousin-german the sonne of Shimeon Dauids brother, posselt her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a carelesse and inhumane manner. Two yeeres after which foule and incestuous act, Abisalam caused him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheepe-shearing; not perchance in reuenge of Thamars rauishment alone: but hauing it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome, in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Amnon, he thought his affaires greatly aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despoiled her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first, made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and liued vnder the sauegard of Talmaj King of Gessur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abisalam by the inuention of Isab, (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his prelence; Hee began instantly to practise against David his father, see-^{ing} king by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equity, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids sinne.

The company which Abisalam gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron, pretending though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that Dauid doubting to be set vpon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surpris: but incamped in the fields and delands with some 600. of his gards, and few else. The priests he left in Hierusalem with the Arke of God, from whom he desired to be aduertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, and seruant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counsels of *Abisalom*s party and confederacy, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a reuolting Counsaillor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the sonne of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred *Dauid*s prosperitie had smothered, but his aduersitie illighted) holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most despihtfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbade Abisbai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his-ruence, to his sonne Salomon. Abisalom being now possessor of Hierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolutely adhere to Abisalom and his cause, without feare of being giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betwene them. This saluage and impious (though crafty counsaile) Achitophel indeede vrged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Dauid: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wiues before thine eyes, and give them vnto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wiues in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. He also gaue aduice to Abisalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of Dauid; which had willingly bene embraced by Abisalom, had not Hushai *Dauid*s faithfull seruant giuen counter-aduice, and swayed it: perswading Abisalom, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his father, than by such a troope, which *Dauid*s valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Abisalom, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeede, after God, the losse of the one, and deliuerie of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the party and the care of Abisalom, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Hiboseth himselfe in the warre against Dauid after *Saul*s death seated himselfe. To which place there repaired vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nahab the Ammonite, whom Dauid loved, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannun, whom Dauid for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after *Hannun*s ouerthrow. In thankfulness whereof he relieved Dauid in this his extremity. There came also to *Dauid*s assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his company.

In the meane time both the King and Abisalom prepared to fight; Abisalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Isab held with Dauid; as office next the King himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace aunciently in France. Dauid, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Isab, Abisbai, and Ittai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisalom. But Isab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembered that Abisalom had lately disposed of his gouernment to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and newes brought him that Abisalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree; when he could not perswade him messenger to returne and kill him; he himselfe with his owne seruants dispatcht him.

It appeared also by the sequell that Isab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and fearing the disposition of Abisalom, he embraced the present aduantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and sorrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outlived all his worldly ioyes, and scene euery delight of life interred. For he so had himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, couered themselves also in the Citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Isab presenting himselfe before Dauid, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the Armie. For first, he told him that he had discourtenanced his faithfull seruants, who had that day preferred his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieve and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Abisalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he vrged that it was generally beleued, that he loved his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull seruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Abisalom liued, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he vse this preualent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publicly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatening: And that will be worse vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these ouer-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Isab raised Dauid from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom he assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the Armie of Abisalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Abisalom had giuen him, and which Isab now enjoyed. For Dauid doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandment.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remission was but extorted, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephiboseth his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly fallly accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oast, to follow him to Ierusalem, that he might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in Dauid, the Armie brake, and Dauid returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba the sonne of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. Dauid employed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because he conceived that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Isab had. He received commandment from Dauid to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which he foreflowed: but being onward on his way, Abisbai, *Isab*s brother, was sent after him, with *Dauid*s guard and best Souldiers, whom also Isab accompanied: and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibson, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no lesse ious of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assailed the Citie with that furie, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and slung it to Isab ouer the walls: which done, he retrained his Armie to Ierusalem, and commanded, as before, all the hosts of Israel.

The next act of Dauids, was the deliuerie of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers cruelty. Dauid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to giue them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also if we may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and indangered; onely he spared Amishiboseth the sonne of Ionathan, both for the loue he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two sonnes of Rispah, whom he bare vnto Saul, and the five sonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites:

Iunius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, the whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid, when he slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, and figurative, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliath, whose speare was weightie as a weauers beame, whereas by the same Eclipse it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliath: Goliath himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leaving no head vnto rebellion; so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against forcaine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirte Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were sixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemed to haue bene giuen vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abisai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the army, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his meritt of bloud vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approued seruices. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue bene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if neede required, into the field, very far exceeded thirty thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and bene hardened with his aduersities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their severall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was General of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the especiall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be guessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths we finde nowhere mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruia, who had bene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and onely Ioab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abisai to stand by his side in his last extremities.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout; when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seauen yeeres of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Ioab, with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine moneths and twentie dayes trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirtie hundred thousand, besides Leui and Beniamin, whereof in Juda and the Cities thereof five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased, to wit, seauen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And heereby hee hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giueth vs this diuine reason; For his mercies are great.

6. VIII.

Of the last acts of Dauid, Adonijahs faction; the reuenge vpon Ioab and Shimei.

ASTLY, when he grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Amnon and Abisalom being now dead) hauing drawne vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Resabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her sonne should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijahs presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Peletites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those tidings being reported to Adonijah, hee presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon, the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all meanes to aduance, and make the businesse publique. To bring these intentions to good effect, hee summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the severall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power, who did repair vnto Ierusalem.

In this assembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Heerein he tooke occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Isaac in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choyce of him among all his Fathers sonnes. In like manner hee said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conforme themselves vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, hee exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approued by the Princes and people, that whereas hee himselfe had giuen three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand of silver, they added vnto it sauen thousand of gold, and ten thousand of silver, besides brasse, iron, and great reueneue, yet needs there must haue beene some other great meanes. It seemes that he made the vttermoost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Dauid, among other preparations for the Temple, built a maie in Melanis (or as Vallapandus corrects it, Achanis) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Pythe, which Ortelius thinkes, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea; from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Iury. Pineda, lib. 4. de rebus Salamonis, c. 1. thinkes that Dauid did this way also enrich himselfe, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly Dauid had many other waies to gather riches. Besides those fruitfull valleys neere Jordan in Trachonitis and Bisan, and the best of Syria, and other Countreies bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike he kept in his owne hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which hee tooke in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1. Chron. 17. that Iehonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the towne; that Extri was ouer the labourers that tilled his ground, Sime ouer the vineyards; and Sabdi ouer the store of the wine; Baal Hanan ouer the Oliue trees, and Ioush ouer the state of the oyle: also that hee had herd-men the Oliue trees, and Ioush ouer his cattell, both in the high Lands, and in the plaines, ouer his Sheepe, Camels, and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandrie and Cattell, the ancient Kings euery where held, both before and after Dauid's time. For we reade of Pharao, that he spake to Ioseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their seruants, to bee Rulers ouer his cattell. Wee reade of Vezia, that hee loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greece Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augeas and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlkely, but that those captiues which were not employed in husbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainefull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaues.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yeerely were brought him, or extraordinary illic sent him, by Tobu and others) wee may adde the great spoyle which hee found in the Cities and Countreies which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitatiouis; by the law of capitation or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a sickele of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as foure pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men were numbered by Iosab. Now although this Law of capitation bee thought by some very learned not to haue beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuerthelessse they confesse is against the Hebrew exposition) yet Dauid vpon this occasion is not vnlkely to haue put it in practice. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that this great masse of gold and siluer left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in priuate, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that hee left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that hee gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of siluer, a great summe: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore wee are to consider, that the treasures of the sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must haue beene hauing receiued continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution euery since the time of Moses and Iosuah. The reuenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of riches and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoyle gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countreie receiued benefit of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euery single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued, and one in five hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoyle of Midian, thirty two thousand women being taken, the Arme had fixteene thousand of them for slaues, and the Congregation had other fixteene thousand; but out of the fixteene thousand giuen to the Arme, were exempted two & thirtie for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this meanes, the lesler that the Arme was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier, but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domestick affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and siluer, and other mettalls found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Amalaites with the losse of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as voluntarie presents.

Now howeouer the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuer got possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must haue beene exceeding great, as containing about one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant Iosab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Sammuel, had vsed to dedicate of the spoyle obtained in warre, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines of other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of Dauid brought into the Land farre greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue bene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue beene the mere fruits of his owne industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he receiued of yeerely reuenuenues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also fixe rich Returnes from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage euery three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Besides this, all Iudas and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians; his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmirena, of Iura; all of Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Ittities, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet dextinguished, though subiected.

Intoth this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by Dauid, who after 40 yeers raigne, and 70. yeeres of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in Dauid's Tombe a maruailous quantitie of treasures, in somuch as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chismanai, or race of Macabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeeres after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Ierusalem; and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleued, in regard of the great exactions with which hee was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which hee got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall considered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent employments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of Dauid the Scriptures haue no mention, but onely the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the

30. yeeres before Salomon; vnlesse more credit should be giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

OF SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birthright, and the cause of Adonijahs death, and of Salomons wisdom.

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Iuda and Israel, in the yeere of the World 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iedidias, or Theophilus, by Nathan, because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched Embassadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custom between Princes very ancient. Whence wee reade that Dauid did in like fort salute Hannum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom.

The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to be slaine by Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijahs desiring by Bertheba, that the young maide Abisag (which lay in Dauids bosome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. Whatsoeuer hee pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the kingdom contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined to wards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wise, and hee that sees but the claw, may know whether it be a Lyon or no: so it may seem that to the quick-sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had beene concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wished Abisag to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And Dauid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not giue them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntill their death.

And this it seemes was the depth of Isoseths quarrell against Abner, for hauing his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid: I haue giuen thee thy masters house, and thy masters wives.

And in the words of Saul vbraiding Jonathan, that he had chosen Dauid to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter dayes, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There might be diuers further occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that hee would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might preiudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Iewes; yet the Kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely, of Iacobs disheriting

Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeareth by the words of Bertheba and Nathan to Dauid, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessary to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder elder brothers right to the Kingdom, it now here appears in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of choosing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, hee rid himselfe also of Joab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: hee displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his Father, hee spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, hee tooke the daughter of Ephraim King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands; Salomon chooseth wisdom, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I haue done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selues what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the conueying after long life in respect of our selues, cannot but proceed of selfe-love, which is the roote of all impietie: the desire of priuate riches is an affection of couetousnesse which God abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in minde of his brothers slaughter, for which hee had not any warrant cyther from Dauid, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to giue him withall that which he desired not. And I haue also giuen thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and liuing creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soone hee iudged the controuersie betweene the two harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomons building and glorie.

HE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof hee had receiued a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another from God. For like as it is writtne of Dauid, that Hee called Salomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tollatus giue the force of a diuine precept to these words, Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my Name.

He began the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth yeere of his reigne, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Esiongeber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almagim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himselfe) many learned men haue writtne, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Asarius, Philopandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand euery month by course: hee also vied 80. thousand Masons in the mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued, hee selected out of the Proglites, besides three thousand and three hundred masters of his worke, so as hee paid and employed in all one hundred eightie three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Sidonians which were farre more skilfull

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Batca, would faine haue Gades or Calis-malis, in olde times called Tartessus, which is the Southwest corner of that Prouince, to be the Tharsis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for loue of his own countrie, and because of some affinitie of sound betwene Tharsis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seeme strange that it should be three yeres ere they that tooke ship in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath bene in part answered already. And further, the intelligent may conceiue of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages betwene Ierusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that wee haue no need to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africa, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrin, which went with them, could not haue bene ignorant of) was along the Mediterranean, and so (besides many wonderfull inconueniences, and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should haue escaped the troublesome land-carriage betwene Ierusalem and the red sea through drie, desert, and theeuish Countries: and within 30. mile of Ierusalem at Ioppe, or some other hauen in Salomons owne Countrie, haue laden and vnladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Africk in largenesse greater than all Africa and Asia, being swallowed vp in the Atlantic Ocean hindered Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this he alreadie Plato in Timæo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mud and made vnpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterranean sea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scowreth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to haue flood: or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath all the rich Peru in the West, fortieeth in the East Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manila, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the small territorie which hee there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

Derebus Sal. l. 4. c. 12. 11.
As it appeares
he tooke a ship
at Ioppe of Ioppe c. 12. 11.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreames of: supposing whereas Ionas sailing to Tharsis the Citie of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterranean sea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming about twelue thousand English miles, along the Mediterranean sea, and so through the streights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast vp Ionas vpon the shore of the red sea, that so hee might haue perhaps some fixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Nimue. This conceit he grounds onely vpon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Ionas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elsewhere he giueth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale finished in three dayes, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Ionas in the bellie of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we send it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor deliuered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore we leaue this man in his dreames, which (were he not otherwise very learned and iudicious) might bee thought vnworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our storie of Salomon.

The Queene of Sabaes coming from Arabe to Salomon, (as it seemes, from Arabe felix, and not, as some thinke, from Aethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions, those are set downe at large in the text. But herein Iosephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queene of Saba Nicaules, Nicaules, the succellour (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Mineus the founder of Memphis; adding that after this Egyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Aethiopia; so werethere other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. Yea, about three hundred yeres after Salomon, Pharao Necho slew Iosias King of Iuda. 2 King. c. 23. 29

2 Chron. c. 35. 26. c. 46. 24.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garisons foureteen thousand Chariots, and twelue thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court euery day thirtie measures of fine flower, threecore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deare, bugles and fowle; foure thousand stales of horses he had for his chariots and other vses, and for the twelue thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stals in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thousand stals or teemes, and in euery teemeten horses, as Iunius and the Genena vnderstand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrak. For the Genena maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Iosephus writeth them Athan, Eman, Chalcaem and Danan the sonnes of Hemon. He spake three thousand Prouerbes, and his songs were one thousand and fise, whereof either the most part perished in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Ciuill causes and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into Gods booke.

§. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he liued.

Now as he had plentie of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women. For besides his seuen hundred Wiues, he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompanie the daughters of Idolators) he tooke Wiues out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heb: and when hee fell a doting, his Wiues turned his heart after other Gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumæa, Rex of Damascus, and by Ierobam his owne seruant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie he had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vitatur, quæ ipse non fecit. God in punishing P. Mart. in reg. sinners, vseth the finnes of others, which he himselfe wrought not.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie yeres he reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and must therefore be found onely by coniecture. The most likely way to guess at the truth in this case, is by considering the actions of Dauid before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the yeres which they consumed, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seauen yeres Dauid reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere he tooke Ierusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to haue bene in the tenth yeere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, liuing in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs haue held him fise yeres, considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadazer; and that in euery of these warres he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely that these seruices occupied any long time, because in those dayes and places there were no winzering camps in use, but at conuenient seasons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies countrie, partly vpon the priuate prouision which euery soldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of Dauid, in which he tooke Mephiboseth the sonne of Nicaules, 2 Sam. c. 21. 17 of Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to haue passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Iosh after the victorie, returned immediately to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre taking vp all the Summer. Dauids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein he brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifestly to haue bene the next yeeres worke, wherein he did cut off all means of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Mosh and Idumaea being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must haue bene the 20. yeere of Dauids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Iosh to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon; wherein also fell out the matter of Uriahs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heauie iudgement laid vpon him by God for his foule and bloody offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the yeere after the death of that childe which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needs therefore haue bene nineteen yeeres old or thereabout, when he began to reigne at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Abisalon slew his brother Amnon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to haue bene one yeeres worke. So the rebellion it selfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasai and the rest, may well seeme to haue bene in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeeres of warre with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the ten remaining yeeres of Dauid there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for the three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbering the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last firmities, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeede it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gath or Nob nere vnto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This war the Philistims undertooke, as it seemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids olde age: for hee fainted now in debaile, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himselfe vnto danger any more. So Dauid had fixe or seauen yeeres of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken partie of Iosh the sonne of Zeruia.

At this time it might both truly be said by Dauid to Salomon, Thou art a wise man, and by Salomon to God, I am but a young childe; for nineteen yeeres of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Neuertheless there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe a childe, that he was but eleuen yeeres old when hee began to reigne. Of these Rabbi Salomon seemes the first Author, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps vpon that which is said of Abisalons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeeres, which they vnderstood as yeeres of Dauids reigne. But whereas Rehoboam the sonne of Salomon was 41. yeeres old when he began to reigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himselfe but a childe of nine or ten yeeres old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned fortie yeeres) were but eleuen yeeres old when his reigne began. To auoide this inconuenience, Iosephus allows 80. yeeres of reigne to Salomon; a report to disagree with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion continued the words of Iosephus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons life. But by such reckoning he should haue bene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and consequently should haue bene borne long before his Father had wone Ierusalem; which is a manifest vntuth. Wherefore the 40. yeeres remembered in Abisalons rebellion, may either seeme to haue reference to the space betweene Dauids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Iosephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeeres; which passed betweene the returne of Abisalon to Ierusalem, and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomons writings.

Here remaine of Salomons workes, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanity of humane nature; in the third he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled, The wisdom of Salomon, (which some giue vnto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientie (saith Hierome) qui Salomonis inscribitur, Graecam re- dolent eloquentiam; The file of the booke of wisdom, which is ascribed to Salomon, fauours the dole of the Graecian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Cirie of God, that the Author of that Booke hath a direct foretelling of the Passion of Christ in these words: Circumueniamus iustum quoniam infirmus est nobis, &c. Let vs circumuent the righteous, 51p. 22. for he is vncleaving to vs, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh vs for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to haue the knowledge of God, and he calleth himselfe the sonne of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Bookes of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Cantica Cantorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi, ascribeth 5. 8. m. fol. 62. to Isay the Prophet, Suidas and Cedrenus report that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graued the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which they say Ezechias pulled downe, because the people neglecting helpe from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries. Reuoc. in Iul. 119.

Of Salomons books of Inuocations and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though as I conceiue, rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vncertaine report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring dispossessed diuers persons, of euill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly so strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer bene read of as this King: who hauing receiued wisdom from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his onely seruice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Idaea, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giuer of all goodnesse, of which he was more libell to this King, than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner: Salomon to any that euer the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that hee might build a house to his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for euer; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a sould? Thy minde covered the whole earth, and wast filled with grave and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the les, and for thy peace thou wast beloued, &c. but thus he concludeth: Thou didst bon thy loynes to Women, and wast ouer come by thy body, thou didst staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

Here the beginning of Salomons reigne; Ageflam the third of the Heracidae in Corinth, Labores in Lacedaemon; and soon after Sylauus Atba the fourth of the Sylus swayd those Kingdomes: Laophanes then gouerning Assiria: Ageflam and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the sixe and twentieth of Salomon reigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Balthazar succeeded, and reigned feuentene yeeres. after Mercators account, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeeres. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antolicus finds Borzoris the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted betwene the death of Hiram, and the reigne of Borzoris.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac or Shisak (as our Englishe Genes. termes him) began to gouerne in Agypt, being the same with him whom Diodes calls Sofachis, Iosephus, Susac, Cedrenus, Susacimus, Eusebius in the column of the Agyptian Kings, Smenes, and in that of the Hebrewes, Susac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reprooueth it as an error in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesostris, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accounting Sesac another Sesostris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostris I haue spoken already in the story of the Agyptian Princes: onely in this he was reprobued, that he caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be scene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Entropius, at such time as Sesostris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheeles next him; which Sesostris perceiuing asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: to whom the captiue King answered, that in those he beheld the instabillity of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddainely carried about, and became the highest, and the vpmost part was as suddainly turned downeward, and vnder all: which when Sesostris had iudiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sesostris, and that he could not be taken for Sesac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Agyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomons Successors vntill the end of Iehosaphat.

§. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Ieroboams Idolatry.

Rehoboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitess, now forty yeeres old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Agypt, since he fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arrival the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. *Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amare mallet quam metui. So should his Empire (saith Iosephus) be more assured, if he desired rather to be beloved than feared: whereof he took three dayes to deliberate before his answer, of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe he knew not how to resolve, so had he not the Iudgement to discern of counsels, which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not onely to continue on the backs of his subjects those burdens which greatly crush them; but (vaunting fallily of greatnesse exceeding his Fathers) he threatened in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heavier, and more vnsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the successe, those younger aduisers greatly mistooke the nature of security, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it selfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be sought for the helpe, and not for the hayne of subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters haue euer lasted long, but those which haue bene* twisted and forged by loue onely? His wiseleffe parasites could well iudge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designs. For being foretold by the Prophet Achab of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people cryed out, What portion haue we in Dauid? we haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Israhel. Now though themselves, euen all the Tribes of Israhel, had consented to Dauids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bands of nature, and their dutie to God, and as all alienated resolute hearts doe, they serued themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hartfull to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speed, and recovered Ierusalem, where preparing to invade Israhel, with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, Shemai in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was layed for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Sichem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Agyptians to follow their Idolatry: he set vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods; or at least by these he represented those Gods, which deliuered them out of Agypt: and refusing the seruice of the Leuites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needs be that by banishing the Leuites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israhel, Ieroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Iosua, for as it is writtten, The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iada, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israhel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophetic and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophetic nor Miracle could make them yeelde. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the authority of Abia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdom; nor by the withering of his owne hand as he stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claue a funder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen him by the commandement of God, who againe recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policie to preceede as he had begun. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodie (saith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, presentisq; utilitates sibi tanquam vltimum finem constituent, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, si iniuria honestatis, leges subueriende, si religio ipsa pessumdanda, si deniq; omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per sua nefas esse sibi persvadent, obtruncant, omnia pereant, nihil ad ipsos, modo id, quod de re sua esse sibi persvadent, cuncta ac finis sit qui talia curet, castigare possit Deus. So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their vniuersall end and scope, their owne commoditie and so present profit, are wont to allenge the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for aduancings, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they thinke that they may doe any thing: If they meane to oppress their neighbour, to overturne all lawes of iustice and honesty, if religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing: let all goe to ruine, what carabey, so long as they may haue what they would, as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeede this allegation of raggione del stato, did serue as well to vp-hold, as at the first the like finnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sicknesse, and calamities, howsoever the wise men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents; which, as being next their eyes and eares, seeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

§. IIII.

Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

As Asa succeeded Asi, who enioyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatresse, but depoting her from her regencie, brake her Idoll, stamp it, and burnt it. He also fortified many Cities, and other places, prouiding (as prouident Kings doe) for the troubles of war in the lease of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, wholes of war in the lease of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judea, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Asi, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer assembled of that Nation, either before or since. For it is writtten, that there came against the Judeans, Zerah of Aethiopia, with an hoste of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountered with an Armie of five hundred and fourescore thousand, leuied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Beniamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoyles both of their Cities and Campes.

That this Zerah was not an Aethiopian, I haue * proued already, and were it but the length betwene Aethiopia and Judea, and the strong flourishing Regions of Aegyptus (who would not suffer a million of strangers to passe through them) it were sufficient to make it appeare how foolish the opinion is, that these invaders were Aethiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereof were spoyled by the Judeans, in following their victory, as places he longing to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth vpon the torrent of Euphrates, which Danid pass over when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proueth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier towne, standing on the vttermost South-border of all Judea, from all parts of Aethiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoyles which Asa tooke, as the cattell, Camels, and sheepe, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adioyning, and not farre off, and not vnknewen Aethiopians. And if it be objected that these desert countries can hardly yeelde a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petrea, and the Desert which compasseth two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arme five hundred and fourescore thousand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should excede in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that hee should beget twelue Princes, &c.

Bascha a King of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadzer, to toyne with him against Asa; to the end to blocke him vp, he fortified Rama, which both in the way from Ierusalem towards Samaria.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne; but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Bascha died in the 26. yeere of Asa; therefore could not Bascha begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reigne, but in the 36. yeere of the diuision of Juda and Israel; for so many yeeres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Armie of five hundred and fourescore thousand good Soldiers, did not easily drue away Bascha, and defeat him of his purposes; the victories of Abi against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah, being yet fresh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Juda, and almuch disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousand of hands, in the late seruice against Zerah, had caused many mens priuie busineses to lye vndispatched, whereby the people being now intentiue to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be vnwilling to stir against the Israhelites, choosing rather to winke at apparant inconuenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might haue deterred Asa from aduenturing himselfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the successe into the hands of Gods. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Bascha, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Bascha. For the Israhelites were his borderers, and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his imitation) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephtalim, without resistance, he spoyled diuers principall Cities thereof, and enforced Bascha to quit Rama, and to leaue the time to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loued neither party, being laden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanan the Prophet repented Asa, in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and assistance of God, he not onely caused Hanan to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore strooken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feete, wherewith after he had bene two yeeres continually tormented, he gaue vp the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

There liued with Asa, Aggeilus the first of the Israelites and Eachi the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Racide. Asarum, and Asarum were Kings in Tyre. Asarum was toke reuenge on his brother Phelotes, for the murder of Ishobab Priest of the goddess Asarta, whom Salomon in doxage worshipped. Asy and Capsy ruled the Latines: Prithades and Ophrates the Assyrians: Terstippus and Phobast the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Aegypt, who dying in the 36. yeere of Asa, left Cheops his successor, that reigned fiftie fixe yeeres, then to the 16. of Asa.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reigne of Asa.

In the reigne of Asa the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegiance to the house of Danid, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The house of Ieroboam had in his latter dayes, the sentence of heauy vengeance laid vpon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the diuision of Israel, for the sinne of Asa, and his reigne over the ten Tribes. One sonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom onely God found so much pietie, as (though it sufficed not to withhold his wrath from that Family) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was most happy) the fauourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good sonne, the vngodly father was soone taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile vnthankfulness to God, that he did not suffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea of Gods extreme hatred, yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols, that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, reigned in the second and third yeeres of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers last yeere of two and twenty did run along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Bascha, so that perhaps this Nadab enioyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seemes that hee little feared the iudgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Ichoram did vpon his brethren, and vpon fundry of his greatest men, as also Iosb did to put to death Zachariah, the sonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, even in the court of the husse of the Lord; and Manasses did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till he replenished Ierusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; beside his sinne, wherewith he made Iuda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of Israel we finde no monument of such arbitrary proceeding, vnlesse perhaps the words of Ichoram the sonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, Cod doe so to me, and more also, if the head of Elisba the sonne of Shaphat shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plaine whether he meant to kill him without more adoe, or to haue him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Ammonites, till they were faine to cate their owne children; which he thought a sufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpose to deliuer them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the liberty which the Israelites enioyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euen sicke for anger; neither was he for that cause put to death, as vpon commandement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a iudicial forme, which might giue satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

The murder of the Prophet is continually ascribed to Iezabel, an impudent woman, to and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people, being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Iuda (such as are registred) proue them to vse a more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned ouer Iuda, from the diuision of the Kingdome, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Ahaziah and his brethren, slaine by Iehu, with the destruction of all the Royall seede of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can reade) stirre vp in the people any such thirst of reuenge, as might by the suddenness and vniformity testifie the affection to be generall, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vnlesse we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after seauen yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannicall abusing the government, whereon she had seized. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seauen of the twenty) were all slaine by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so farre from embroiling their hands in the blood of their Soueraignes, that (after Nadab) they did neuer foibeare to reuenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approue the good successe of treason, vnlesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being thoroughly reuenged vpon another two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, vpon Zimri and Shallum, who traitorously got and vsurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seauen remaine, whose ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is precisely said of the slaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death of Pekah, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that neuer any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any moriue vrging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (howeouer all that the Law calls treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which haue here most preuailed, the furie of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howeouer wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soueraigne, but rather forbearing the aduantages gotten vpon his Royall person: which if any man impute vnto grosse ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truly, ascribe to a ignorant affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who, who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands giue assistance to Iupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying, that Monarches need not to feare any courbing of their absolures by mightie subjects, as long as by wisdom they keepe the hearts of the people; who will be fure to come in on their side. Though indeed the storie might very well haue borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of government sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not without assistance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuices of the greatest and threwelest politicians: euen Sherife and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening Rebelle how mightie foucer, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being seldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of gouernment there was such, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept visually disarmed. For otherwise it would haue beene almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the royall blood of Iuda, should by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother haue destroyed all the seede of Dauid, and vsurped the Kingdome very nere 7. yeeres, without finding any resistance. Yea when Iehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to set vp Iosb their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to giue to these Captaines and their men, the speares and the shields that were King Dauids, and were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did neuer seek to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their fixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Ash, admitted a seventh of a new familie, rather than they would subiect themselves, with those of Iuda and Beniamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heauie yoke.

So Ash hauing seene the death of 7. kings of Israel, died himselfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leauing Iehosaphat his sonne to deale with Ahab the sonne of Omri, who was the eight King ouer the tenne Tribes.

§. VII.

Of Iehosaphat and his contemporaries.

Iehosaphat, who succeeded Ash, was a Prince religious and happie; he destroyed all the Groues, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and sent teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one hee had siluer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thousand and foure hundred. The numbers of men of warre were more then admirable: for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thousand; Iehohannan of two hundred and fourescore thousand; and Amasai of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides those, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Targetters, and of Archers vnder Eliada, two hundred thousand; and vnder the commandement of Iehozabab a hundred and fourescore thousand; so which numbred together, make eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand, all which are said to haue waited vpon the King, besides his garrisons.

That Iuda and Beniamin, a terrible not much exceeding the Councie of Reue, should muster eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand fighting men, is very strange; and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Iosb in Dauids time found foure hundred thousand; Rihoboam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand; Abia foure hundred and eight thousand; Ash five hundred and fourescore thousand; Amaziah foure hundred and eight thousand; Ash five hundred and fourescore thousand. Sure inrolled all that could beare armes, and they amounted to thirte hundred thousand. Surely, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Iehosaphat that Moab &c. Ammon were

§. III.

The doings of Iehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

DEVt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequels. When once the good olde man, their Father, was dead, the younger sonnes of Iehosaphat found strong Cities, a weak defence, against the power of him vnto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more ado; if they stood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish King-dome against them; so that the apparent likelihood of their finall ouerthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken and flaine, and with them for company many great men of the Land; such belike, as cyther had taken their part, when the Tyrant sought their liues, or had bene appointed Rulers of the Countrey, when Iehoram was depofed from his Government; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iustice, could hardly auoyd the doing of many things, derogatorie to their yong Masters; which if he would now call treason, saying that hee was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Iehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innouations in Religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and safe conduct vnto Superstition and Idolatry, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, hauing such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that about all other sinnes; but hee vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to haue set vp Idolatry on by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listeth, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and hauing hitherto, since Dauids time, bene gouerned by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themselves a King. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, wherof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom hee should haue subdued, and kept his seruants. Now began the prophetic of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esaus in processe of time should breake the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their owne well, that when, after many ciuill and forraigne warres, the Jewes by sundry Nations had bene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his Son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, euen in Ierusalem it selfe.

The freedom of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Juda, which in the time of Iosua had a peculiar King, to rebell against Iehoram, and set it selfe at libertie. Libna stood in the confines of Beniamin and Dan, farre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so vnable it was to haue maintained it selfe in libertie, that it may seeme strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue bene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israelites held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that hee would not haue accepted of the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe wee read that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate.

Chron. 21. 10. Iehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not onely bene the first and remote cause, but euen the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Towne of the Leuites: who must needs be driuen into great extremities, when a religion contrarie to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsiue authoritie to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which, being deuout men, they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten reuolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather inuited the Israelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainment: vnder Idolaters they must haue bene without it, whether they liued free or in subiection. Yet it seemes that priuate reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than suffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Iehosaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good olde King appointing new Gouernours, and giuing them especiall charge to doe iustice without respect of persons, vsed these words, The Leuites shall be Officers before you, be of good courage, and do it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seemes, that he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than ist neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be euen with them, and make them now to seele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heauy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may iustly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient: to haue ouerwhelmed any one Towne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might well in one month haue cast into it with shouels, by ordinary approaches.

But it seemes that of those great numbers which his Father could haue leued, there were not many whom Iehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps hee thought it a easier losse, to let one Towne goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loued; are faine themselves to stand in feare of those; by whom they might haue bene dreadfull vnto others.

§. IIII.

Of the miseries falling vpon Iehoram, and of his death.

THEse afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a Prophetic in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wiues, and his owne bodie. Hereby likewise it appeares that he was a cruell Persecutor of Gods seruants; in as much as: Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and euill Kings; but were faine to denounce Gods iudgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and farre from him. This Epistle is saide to haue bene sent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus Chron. 21. 22. it may bee that Elias left this prophetic in writing behinde him, or that (as some conclude) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that wee read Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be beleued than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heauen to S. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophetic was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Judah, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of Dauid, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to haue bene then as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrey affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thicke set in Juda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very lately Cities. But it must be considered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the Prouisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skillfull in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions farre remooued from them. At this day hauing lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as liue in Arabia in selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous passengers, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other meanes of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seeme to haue beene, that spoyled Iudaea in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrey was alwaies barren and desert, wanting manuell Arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in their action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may inferre, that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Iuda and Beniamin vnder Iehosaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had been enough to haue driuen away far greater forces than these enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people beene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes iealousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seeme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his Palace in Ierusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrey, where his wiues and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we reade not that they did sacke the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would haue inuited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Ierusalem in selfe by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guards too weake to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore hauing done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conueigh away.

The slaughter committed by Iehu on the two and fortie brethren of Abazia, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sonnes, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seede perished (onely Ioss excepted) vnder the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeeres after this inuasion of the Philistims, and Arabians, make it seeme probable, that the sonnes of Iehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murder beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly striken, vntill it was in a manner quite heued downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the bodie of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcase. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Iuda, though his owne sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had beene his Fathers euill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous entering of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to prouide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne such Counsellors of the house of Abah, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnconsonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be layd vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoid. Such is the qualitie of wicked Inligators, hauing made greedie vse of bad employments, to charge, not only vpon his owne vices, but with their faults also, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Iehoram fel out indeed in a buisie time; when his friend and cousin the Israélite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramites; and therefore could haue had no better leysure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her owne minde, than hee had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her husband, when hee was distressed by the Philistims. Yea rather hee needed and craved the assistance of the men of Iuda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had noticed so well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide mee by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reuealed will of God, accomplish neuertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, con-found themselves in the seeming-wise deuices of their owne folly: as likewise to the end, that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dictateth vnto them. For in such kinde of vnhappy subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the reigne of Abazia, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

Chazias, or Abazia, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his reigne ouer Iuda in the twelfth yeere of Iehoram the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one yeere. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficulty than importance to know it; yet hath it bredde much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Tornellius, alleaging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that hee was twentie yeeres olde in the beginning of his Kingdome; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe giue him two yeeres more. Like enough he is to haue beene young: for hee was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion hee altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of state, hee likewise vp-held the league made with the house of Abah. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill success. He accompanied his Cousin the Israélite against Ramoth Gilead, which they won, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduenture his owne person, which escaped not vnwounded.

The Towne being won was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, Iehoram King of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Izreel, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Abazia returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scanty one yeere, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part,) when he did make a new iourney, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindered, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine piece of worke so to leaue his kingdome, hauing no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet vpon the house of Abah. And hereunto at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to haue beene accidentally; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab : and how that Familie was destroyed by Iehu.

THe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together; who calling out among them Iehu, a principall man,ooke him apart, and anointed him King over Israel, rehearsing vnto him the Prophecie of Elizeus agai[nst] the house of Ahab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bredd in the Captaines a desire to know the errand, which Iehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had over-heard all the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the Prophecie of Elizeus was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu, who had vpon the sudden this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himselfe in possession of it, but vied the first heat of their affections who ioyned with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerely concerned him, and was not to be so fore-flowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the result might be carried th Israel, where- by the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee : this being forerelence, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court whyle it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now lo well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemed that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Zebabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Abazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queene, as to visit the King.

Certain it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did never so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the blood Royall there were, that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the Sonne of Queen Izabel had wonne Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and hee wonne it by valiant fight, wherein hee received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophetic of Elias, might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the maiestical face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his blood expected.

In the middle of this securitie, whilst the great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebells & enemies : or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already achieved, and the Queene Mother dressing her selfe in the brauest manner to come down amongst them ; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a company coming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Arinie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Only the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as he might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance : yet the King to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went ; and hee was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe shewes bred some suspition in Iehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew fo neerer, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakness caused his Chariot to bee made ready, and issued forth with Ahazias King of Juda in his company.

company, whose presence added maistie to his traine, when strength to refitt, or expedition to flee had beene more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Iehu began to flurle Iehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answere, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the scaffold to his fellow King, he returned away to haue fled. But Iehu loone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, and threw his carkease into that field, which, purchased with the blood of the rightfull owner, was to be covered with the blood of the vniust possessor. Neyther did Athaliah escape to well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him rill death did giue vpon him.

The Kings Palace was lying to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Isebel might haue beene aduertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgements she had once against her long before, had other taken her, when she least expected it. But these full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her false ready in all bold, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitors, or at least to reuenge some Amphibegone, which she should expresse her bruite spirit, and brand him with their a-reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did she thinke vpon the hungry dogs that were ordained to deuour her, whose paunches the sibium, with which she beframed her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith she armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, she opened her window, and looking out vpon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enioyed the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in meeke humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly, as are all things, how soeuer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuchs that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as, with any compassion of her fortune; vsuch lesse was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to venge him, hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deeds and honor by words. He onely called to her servants to know which of them would be on his side, and soone found them ready to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Heerevpon hee commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed: without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein she had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had bene denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her owne servants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord and these perished miserably struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilst her insulting enemy late on Horse-backe, adding indignitie to her greefe by scornfull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and tampling her bodye vnder foote. Her dead carcase that was left without the walls was deuoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatric, murther, and oppression, with flow, but sure payment, and full interest.

Abaziah King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehu, was over-taken by the way where hee lurked, and receiving his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samarita, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and feeke his buriall in his owne kingdome; and this favour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jerusalem, where hee was entred with his Ancesors, having reigned about one yeere.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded her.

§. 1.

Of Athalia her usurping the Kingdome, and what pretences she might forge.

2 Chron. 22. 2.

After the death of Ahaziah, it is said that his house was not able to retain the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her Sonne, have given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Iuab, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoyle of her Sonne, under whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forthwith lay hold upon all the Princes of the bloud, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her selfe, & reigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subject. Shee had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsaillours vnto her sonne, such as were fitt for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that shee kept a strong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is, that the great execution done by Iehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to stirre, whatsoever they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it be, is seldome or neuer so shamelesse as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royall bloud, all of them in a manner, slaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children destroyed by the Philistines, began euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faire likelihoods, those possibilities where-with her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might shee giue him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remained onely in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnkely to chooseth a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laid upon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contriue the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not onely his Successour, but also the reuerfioner, and so to provide, that the Crowne might neuer bee subiect to any rising, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best: if the worst that might be feared coming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such persuasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the ialous Tyrant thinke, that the onely way to frustrate all deuices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia tooke no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might shee do it in her Sonnes. For Ahaziah (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wiues, in respect of his owne borne-Mother, little better then Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischievous woman forgat her selfe so farre in her wicked policie, that shee lost all opportunitie which the weaknesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring vnto her selfe some seeming Title: yet could shee afterwards faile some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another World. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order der for her affaires before-hand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the suddaine death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her husband being by other women was young and vnable to resist. We plainly finde, that shee had many Nephewes of Ahaziah, to the number of two and forty, were sent to the Court of Ierusalem, onely to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queene. The slender occasion of which long iourney, considered together with the quality of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could be growne to any strength) maketh very suspicious, that their entertainment in Iezabels house would onely haue beene more formally, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Iehoiada. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as haue aspired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust but the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could giue, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing wherof one may say, Be-cause it is hold, this is new? It hath bene already in the old time that was before vs. That a King might slie his brothers bloud, was proued by Salomon upon Adonias; that he might alieane the Crown from his naturall Heires; Dauid had giuen proofe; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entering into another. Iehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: Dauid purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Iehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might alieane the remainder at his pleasure, or if Ahaziah sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to be answered with the words which Iehoiada the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of Iaath: Behold, the King; whose must reigne; as the Lord hath said of the sonnes of Dauid. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did so pretend some title, what soeuer it might be, to the Crowne of Iuda; yet is it most certaine that shee had thereunto no right at all, but onely got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so shee held it sixe whole yeeres, and a part of the seauenth, in good seeming securitie.

§. II.

How Iehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

At this time Iehu did neuer goe about to disturbe her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posterity of Abab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Aramites, wherein he was so farre ouercharged, that hardly he could retaine his owne, much lesse attempt vpon others. Of the line of Abab there were seuerall liuing in Samarita, out of which number Iehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was, which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom hee had slaine, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their seruice, wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them altogether into one Temple, where hee slew them: and in the same zeale to God vtterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuised by Ieroboam, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should be allured vnto the house of Dauid; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: hee had receiued his kingdome by the vnexpected grace grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sinne of Ieroboam, that the Kingdome should remaine in his Familie, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serue; he would needs helpe to please our Gods, should denie with his owne Circumspection, doing therein like a foolish greedy gamester, who by stealing a needle, and to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole rest. Hee had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the vie of a superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatrie of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many, beauer they were, had not once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom (to obtaine them) hee now forsooke, had not giuen him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the Executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may find in the prophetic of Elizaeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou sit on fire, and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rent in pieces their women with child. So did not only the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable misery vpon all the Land. For the furie of Hazael's victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one inuasion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrey beyond the River of Jordan. Norwithstanding all these calamities, it seemes that the people repent not of their Idolatrie; (For in those dayes the Lord began to loathe Israel), but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble House of Ahab, vnder which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were faine to make wofull shifts, liuing vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master than that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in seruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses; ouerwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to auoid, and therein by God whom they first forsooke, forsaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wisdome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III. Of Athaliahs Government.

THese calamities falling vpon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giuing her leisure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vnlesse it were so that she held some correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father King Aza, who had done the like. And some probability that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow vpon Baalim. Such a sacrilege, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her owne Idolatrie, with such pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessity of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successeur was faine to doe the like, being there-unto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Vnder this impious government of Athalia, the deuotion of the Priests and Leuites was very notable, and serued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, howsoeuer the Queenes proceedings aduanced the contrary. For the poverty of that sacred Tribe of Leui must needs haue bene exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they liued, being now very low, and small; and the store

store laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robbrie. Yet they vp-held in all this misery the seruice of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IIII. Of the preservation of Ioas.

Iehoiada then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wise, and religious man. To his carefulnesse it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort vp-held in those vnhappy times. His wife was Iehoshebeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and sister to Ahaziah, a godly Lady and vertuous, whose piety makes it seeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrary: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education vnder such a Mother could haue permitted her to be such as she was. By her care Ioas the yong Prince that reigned soone after, was conueighed out of the nursery, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly he was brought vp.
 How it came to passe that this yong childe was not hunted out, when his body was missing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had auoided that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after innovations, and so be the lesse conformable to the present government. So Ioas was deliuered out of that slaughter, he and his Nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peraduenture to be cast away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman in that gaue him sucke, who foolishly doubting that she her selfe should haue bene slaine, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coinie such tales, and rather sweare them to be true in their owne knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their ioyfull tidings.

§. V. Whose Sonne Ioas was.

†. I. Whether Ioas may be thought likely to haue bene the Sonne of Ahazia.

NOW concerning this Ioas, whose sonne he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirme, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of Ahaziah, seeme plaine enough. How a ny figure of the Hebrew language might giue title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to auisore the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, th thinke him to haue bene, or not, the naturall Sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is said, that the house of Ahazia was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this Ioas was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his Father. And herunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For she perceiving that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom she had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyranny exercised by her husband at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now be reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had bene here to the Crowne; for she that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authority she might haue done her pleasure, and bene the more both obeyed by others,
 and

and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needefull, that she should be so vnnatural, as to destroy the childe of her owne sonne, of whose life she might haue made greater vse, than the could of his death: whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than that of Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast aside, when as neither necessity vtgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requirerh it, yea when all humane policy doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perfwaded.

†. II.

That Ioas did not descend from Nathan.

BVt (as it is more easie to finde a difficulty in that which is related, than to shew how it might haue otherwile bene) the pedigree of this Ioas is, by them which thinke him not the sonne of Ahazia, set downe in such sort that it may very iustly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon, to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdome with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succcede it. Concerning this Nathan the sonne of Dauid there are that would haue him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Aug. sometime was, but afterward he reuked it, as was meete; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sonnes of Dauid, by Bathsua the daughter of Amies, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the fame of Ioas, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue bene the children of Vria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenſis, who follow the Hebrew expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the onely begotten of his mother, doe approue this exposition: for we reade of no more than two sonnes which Bathsua or Bathsbeba did beare vnto Dauid, whereof the one begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did liue. So that th: rest must needs haue bene the children of Vria, and are thought to haue bene Dauids onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Ioas had not bene the sonne of Ahazia, then must that pedigree haue bene false, wherein S. Matthew deriuech him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Saniour issued from the loynes of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had onely bene of his line by courtisie of the Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might haue bene. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Ioas was not of the posterity of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Friv. Annus his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annus can make Authorsto speake what he list.

†. III.

That Ioas may probably be thought to haue bene the sonne of Ichoram.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, methinks it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickednesse of Ichoram the sonne of Iehoshaphat King of Juda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise hee would give him a light, and to his children for euer: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Ichoram, there was not a sonne left him, save Iehoahas the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that after those massacres of Ichoram vpon all his brethren, and of the Philistims and Arabians vpon the children of Ichoram, one of the seede of Dauid escaped; why may it not be thought that he was said to haue escaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preserved? for had all the race of Salomon been: rooted vp in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would haue bene extant, of an euent so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeede apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preservation of the house of Dauid, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Iehoshas, in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the natural, and not onely legal issue remaining of Dauid, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Ioas, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the youngest sonne of Ichoram, whose life Athalia as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preservation of Dauids line, by Gods especiall mercy, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Ahazia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all slaine by Iehu; than haue reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progeny, wherein one onely did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Ichoram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the History) reuenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians, but being onely begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation he had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement laid vpon Ichoram and all his children, onely Iehoahas his youngest son was exempted, whom therefore if I should affirm to be the same with Ioas, which is called the sonne of Ahazia, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwile haue bene. For it was the youngest sonne of Ichoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, seeing that he was twenty yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reigne, and consequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeere of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more vnkely, either that Ichoram should haue begotten many children before he was eightene yeeres old, or that hauing (as he had) many wives and children, hee should vpon the sodaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty yeeres following: each of which must haue bene true, if this were true that Ahazia was the same Iehoahas, which was his youngest sonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse crueltie of Athalia, in seeking the life of Ioas, are easily cleered, if Ioas and Iehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seuen yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if we vnderstand of yeeres compleat, he might haue bene a yeere old at the death of Ichoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sicknesse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall sonne of Ichoram, though called the son of Ahazia, than it were to say, as great Authors haue done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that he was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might haue serued as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoahas, that foundeth much more neere to Ioas, than to Ahazia, in an English ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skillfull in that language) through the diuersitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Ahazia himselfe be also called Azaria, and must haue had three names, if he were the same with Iehoahas; in which manner Ioas might also haue had severall names; yet, because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion vpon the weake foundation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the consideration of such as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leasure to consider of this point.

†. IIII.

Vpon what reasons Athalia might seeke to destroy Ioas, if he were her owne grandchild.

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly receiued, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not onely blinded by the passions ons of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some vnnaturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the blood Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not always chaste) had imitated the liberty of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraid by Iehu to her sonne; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlike in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certaine it is that she had sonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to settle the Crowne vpon her owne children, she did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Iosias, if to she were his grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, lest when he came to yeeres, it might draw him from her deuotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for she made him spend all his time in idle iourneys, to no other apparant end, than that she might rule at home; and he liuing abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his tutorelle. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine deuices, then was Athalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to Iosias, we neede not seeke into the reasons; moving her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

§ VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of vsing coniecture in Histories.

Hus much concerning the person of Iosias, from whom, as from a new sprout, the tree of Dauid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diuersitie betweene it and others, the lesse me thinks I neede to suspect mine owne presumption, as deserving blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in liberty of coniecture. For all Histories doe giue vs information of humane counsailes and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times falsely. This we often finde in prophane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great vndertakings to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeede God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Iewes in Egypt vnto Ieremie the Prophet reprehending their idolatry. For, howsoeuer the written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishments laid vpon them for contempt thereof, were very terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their wills, that they would not by any means be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queen of Heauen, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vsed to doe; for then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no euill: adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off that seruice of the Queen of Heauen. So blinde is the wisdom of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde out there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not peruerced by vaine additions.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel and Iuda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that haue beene written by the most sufficient of merely humane authors: it scutch downe expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his ouer-forwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his familie, to the securitie of Iehoram in Izrael; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the coming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his revealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this storie, by many great examples, giues most notable prooffe. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidaie, that Historians doe borrow s. phi sidi. h. of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informa- Appl. for Poetry tions are often false, records not alwayes true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discouer the passions which did for them first on foot. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Liue euery one circumstance of Claudius his iourney against Asdrubal in Julie, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historically, nor Poetically) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which haue gouerned their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motives, or impediments of euery business; and so figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to giue assurance, howsoeuer it may giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearchable: and Princes, howsoeuer their intents be feldome hidden from some of those many eyes which pierce both into them, and into such as liue about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtilt miste, they concale the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lye dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations, on which they begat, are conuerted to another vse. The industrie of an Historian, hauing so many things to wearie it, may well be excused, when finding apparant cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weak minde is more effectually, than many that seeme farre greater. So comes it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or Townes, beginne with a few strawes, that are wadded or not seene; when the flame is discovered, hauing fastned vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoeuer the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was moied abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton desire of Queen Atossa, to haue the Grecian da- Herod. 1. her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had received any iniury; and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enioy what was already gotten.
